In May 1805 I had the good fortune to discover the station of Ad Vigessimum by evidence not to be controverted, the the square agger with rounded angles, and other more infallible criterion's of its Roman character , such as bricks and Pottery, and that in a wild, mountainous part of the country, at a distance from any town, building or other casualty to which such appearance so liable to mislead might be ascribed; and exactly in the most direct line from Carmarthen to St David's and nearly within the distance of twenty miles from the former and a little less from the latter.

With regard to the exact site of the Roman Menapaia I have been less successful, though I have not been wanting in my researches for that purpose; yet, in a corn country, for ages in a constant rotation of Husbandry, and of later years much sub divided by fences, it may be difficult, nay, almost impossible, to trace any very distinct vestiges of the Roman enclosure, most probably constructed of turf, or if of more durable Vitruvian materials liable to the changes known on the coast to have been occasioned by the encroachment of boisterous sea, and either swept away by its waves, or whelmed under its drifting mountains of sand.

But there is every reason to presume that it did not stand where the present city does, otherwise the pious devotees who first settled there could not have been said to have selected a spot whose recluse situation alone determined their choice. For the origin of the New Menapia, or St David's obscure, and I may say as little explored as the source of the Nile, we must be reconciled to grope through the dim twilight of legend till the first kindled rush light of history lends us its feeble ray to direct our pursuit. Most writers agree that there was a religious establishment there prior to the time of David, instituted by St Patrick. Some make him a native of the country, and thus account for his attachment ; others affirm , without settling the place of birth, that Patrick, on his return from the continent after visiting several parts of Wales, became enamoured of the retired situation of the Valle called Vallis Rosina, remote from all worldly intercourse on the Irish sea, in which the present cathedral stands; and there abiding, vowed to devote himself to the service of God, but by a heavenly vision, was warned not to fix his heart on this obscure retreat, as the spot was intended for one who should not be in existence in less than thirty years; and that he, St Patrick, was reserved for a more glorious and active employment in a country yet a stranger to the word of life , which he was destined to convert to Christianity; the angelic minister adding to hush the murmurs and settle the scruples of the holy man ' Be of good cheer, let no doubts perplex, no fears depress thee, I will attend companion of thy way, giving a blessing to thy mission. And , moreover, to confirm thy faith , I will from this spot shew thee the country Thou art directed to", when the saint, as he was instructed turned his eyes westward from a stone to this day called Patrick's Bench or seat, notwithstanding the intervention of mountains and sea, most miraculously discovered Ireland. The heavenly summons he instantly obeyed, and setting sail, having first wrought a miracle by raising a man of the name of Dunawd from the dead, safely arrived in the Land of promise. Besides the eminent sanctity of this child , the pre-destined successor of Patrick was foretold by Gildas Albanus a short time before his birth; for when Gildas was preaching to a great multitude in a certain Church at Caer Morva, that is a city or camp on the sea coast, in the promontory of Pebediaaug, or St David's land, a woman at that moment entering the Church, he was suddenly deprived of the power speech, who, on being asked the cause of so strange a circumstance, replied “one Nonnita, a pious woman now present, is great with child and will shortly be delivered of a son endowed with a greater portion of the divine spirit than has ever yet fallen to the share of any preacher in this country. To him must I resign my situation as better able to fill it , and this an angel of the Lord has declared to me”

History now, unencumbered with the idle trappings of superstition or credulity, takes us by the hand, and presents us with facts instead of fables.

By the best accounts the celebrated patron saint of Wales was born AD 460, the same year to use the impressive words of an ancient author,” in which Britain was dismembered by the Saxons, God recompensing the loss by the birth of St David, one of the greatest lights the Church ever enjoyed, both in regard to the sanctity of his life, vigour of his authority, and zeal in repressing heresy, and exalting ecclesiastical discipline “ Having received a preparatory education, he no sooner promoted to the priesthood than he became a disciple of Paulinus in the Isle of Wight and after living some years profiting by his instruction returned to his native country, where, at a place not far off from Old Menapia, called Vallis Rosina, endeared to him as well on account of its secluded as from the partiality shewn to it by St Patrick, who was there supposed to have laid the ground work of a religious establishment, he founded a Monastery, having for its government formed rules most severely rigid , and giving in himself an example of their practice, which, as this monastic institution did not come within any order known to this island, I shall beg to leave to lay before my Reader, without endeavouring to abridge or modernize, in the antiquated but forceful language of old Capgrave “St David” saith he “having built a Monastery near Menevia in a place called Rosy valley, gave this strict rule of monastical profession; that every man should labour daily with his hands for the common good of the monastery, according to the apostle's saying ' he that doth not labour let him not eat' for those who spend their time in idleness debase their minds, which become unstable and bring forth impure thoughts, which restlessly disquiet them.

The monks there refused all gifts or possessions offered them by unjust men; they detested riches; they had no care to ease their labours by the use of oxen or other cattle, for everyone was instead of riches an oxen to himself and his brethern ;

They never conversed together by talking but only when necessity required, but each performed the labour enjoined of him.

Joining thereto prayer of holy meditation on divine things; and having finished their their country work they returned to the Monastery, where they spent the remainder of the day till the evening in reading or writing.

In the evening at the sound of the Bell they all left their work, and immediately repaired to the Church where they remained till the stars appeared, and then went all together to their refecton, eating sparingly and not to satiety, for any excessive eating, though it only be only of Bread, occasions luxury.

Their food was Bread, with roots or herbs seasoned with salt, and their thirst they quenched with a mixture of water and milk.

Supper being ended, they continued about three hours in watching, prayers and genuflections. As long as they were in Church it was not permitted to any either to slumber or sneeze, or cast forth spittle.

After this they went to rest and at cock crowing they rose and continued at prayer till day appeared. All their inward attentions and thoughts they discovered to their superior, and from him they demanded permission in all things, even when they were urged to the necessities of nature. Their clothing was the skins of beasts. Whosoever was desirous to adjoin himself to their holy conversation, he was obliged to remain ten days at the door of the Monastery, as a reprobate unworthy to be admitted of their society, and there he was opposed to rude and opprobrious scorns.

But if all that time he patiently suffered all mortifications , he was received by the religious senior who care at the gate , whom he served, and was by him instructed; in which condition he remained a long time exercised in painful labours and grievous mortifications, and at last was admitted to the fellowship of the brethren.....

[Town]

St David's though now the meagre exurbia of the city it once was conveys to us the outline of its former consequence. The city without the close, finely situated on the sloping ground facing the sea, at the pleasant distance of two miles, studded with rocks called the Bishop and his Clerks, was regularly laid out and distributed into Streets, lanes and alleys, dignified with names, such as High street, Nun street, New street, Ship street, Pitt street, Philpot lane, Whitewell lane &c. High street in which the cross stands and Markets were held (I say were, for now it has none) was of such extent in length and breadth as to be an ornament to any town; nor were the other Streets very confined or ill built for their day, as the existing remains of many old dwelling houses though very inferior to those of some extensive public buildings I remember clearly testify.

[Close]

But the close, the ecclesiastical palladium, including within its embattled wall the venerable cathedral, the episcopal palace, the still habitable houses of some of the dignitaries, together with the skeletons of several in ruins, exhibit such remains of grandeur as may justify us in forming the most magnificent notions of their former establishment. This close was in circuit twelve hundred yards, had a walk round with a crenellated parapet. The entrance was by four handsome gateways or porths, answering to the four cardinal points, such as Porth y twr, Tower gate to the east, Porth Patrick, Patrick's Gate to the south, Porth Gwyn, the White gate to the west, Porth Bwnning, or Bunning's gate , to the north. This enclosure , allowing for the cemetery and suitable gardens to most of the houses, was richly built upon, and in its present state of decadency, as it bursts on the sight from the entrance above the valley, forms a most striking coup d'oeil.

[The Tower Gate]

The Tower gate through which is the principal entrance into the close as leading from the town immediately, and connecting with all the main roads from the interior, consists of a large octagonal tower sixty feet in height, with a noble doorway facing the east end of the Church and opening into the churchyard. This building, divided into stories, formed the consistory court and the record office of the see. In the opposite wing, consisting of a tower, but of a very different form, and connected with the other by a range of buildings extending over the gateway, were the council chamber and other large apartments, supposed to have been appropriated to the mayor of the town, as they were only entered by a door and staircase on the town side. Under these apartments were the porter's lodge on the one side of the gateway, and on the other a prison with a dungeon in the centre, a dark subterraneous vault or cavern, with no adit than a circular opening in the floor, covered with a strong grating of iron by which the malefactors were let into it.

[Precentor's House]

A paved road without the Church yard walls leads straight from this entrance to the house of the Precentor; a dignitary tantamount to the Dean of other cathedrals, which adjoins the south wall of the close, and consists of a handsome Hall with several commodious sitting and lodging rooms, and excellent offices of every kind. The house is recessed in a court, and most of the principal rooms that owe their resented elegant form and distribution to the late Mr Archdeacon Holcombe, occupy a front looking on the little cheerful Valle, justly called the Merry Valle through which the Alan glitters in its meandering course, and open to a terrace raised by Chanter Davies about eighty years ago, below which are pleasant gardens well laid out. Water of the finest quality from the sainted spring of Whitewell, a little without the walls of the close at the back of the house communicates through leaden pipes to every part of it and its offices.

Next adjoining were the prebendary of Llandewi Aberarth's grounds, buildings in ruins; and more to westward, the Archdeacon of Carmarthen's extensive grounds, but buildings also in ruins. To the south, and extending to the close wall is a field called the Chanter's orchard, and in it a fish pond supplied from the river, but belonging to the Bishop, and was evidently an appendage to the palace. These last are divided from the precentor's gardens and the prepandal grounds of Aberarth by the road leading to Patrick's Gate; a little below which in the close wall I observe without, a slit or opening about five feet from the ground to an oblique funnel within, seeming for admitting letters or packages in case of the absence of the porter at the gate, or the inadmissibility of every common messenger into the mysterious privacy of the conclave without undergoing many previous formalities, a sort of state quarantine.

At the south west corner of the said orchard skirting which the river runs, there is an arched bridge, and over it a square habitable tower jutting out from the close wall.

The bridge from the building that surmounts it is called Pont Cerwyn Dewi, the bridge of David's brewing vat. Though this, probably, the residence of the officer who took care of the orchard and the vivarium or fish-pond, seemed to be a way from the large spot of ground laid out in a similar manner on the other side of the river, thus united with the palace, and forming such an outlet as appears to have been the constant appendage to the houses of the great in those days, whither in summer they retired for air and shade, or the pleasures of the Bowling Green, after an early dinner or at an hour not too late for a fashionable breakfast.

[The Bishop's palace]

The bishops palace occupied a square space on the western side of the river with four fronts south west, south east, north west, north east and exhibit a ruin of prodigious extent of the early pointed architecture with superb decorations, particularly the noble stair case porches by which you ascended into the different suites of apartments, the finishing line of its walls, and its windows all lofty and happily disposed to say nothing of the prodigious dimensions of all its parts from the royal apartments to the kitchen. The grand entrance to it was through a beautiful gateway now ruined, and adjoining was the porters lodge opening into a spacious quadrangle. Directly opposite was an elegant porch with a flight of steps leading into the great Hall erroneously called King John's the archway of which gives you a rare example of an inverted ogee sweep, and above it are two niches richly wrought with statues in them. This magnificent room is ninety six feet by thirty three, and is lighted by lofty side windows, and a curious circular one at the south end filled with rich mullions and tracery.

At the south west end of the Hall was a large drawing room; and adjoining, more to the west, a range of buildings, probably the royal bed chambers. The Chapel, whose tower and spire steeple of freestone are still standing, connected with the drawing room by a door opening into it, and with the outer court by a staircase and porch, that likewise served to unite the apartments between the Chapel and the offices that appear to have occupied the greater part of one side of the square, and made the return of another.

The north east side of the quadrangle was entirely appropriated to the Bishop, whose Hall was sixty seven feet by twenty five, and entered by a handsome porch and flight of steps from the court, having at the north end a large drawing room and more northwards a Chapel reaching to a porter's lodge. The Chapel like that of the King's had an entrance into it from the drawing room and another from the court by a sumptuous porch and flight of steps. To the east facing the Church there was a range of buildings for the bishops bed chambers and other private rooms. At the south end of the Bishop's Hall was the kitchen of a very curious and singular, I may almost venture to say unique construction; it was an oblong square thirty six feet by twenty eight, with a low pillar in the centre, from which sprang four groins, forming circular divisions, each division gradually lessening funnel wise into a chimney, and including every culinary convenience on an immense scale. The kitchen was so placed and contrived as to answer the suite of royal apartments, as well as the Bishop's having doors into each.

The rooms within were all lofty, but the walls without were seven feet higher consisting of a parapet of the most majestic design, carried all round the buildings. This parapet is made out by a succession of arches resting on small, neat octangular columns with ornamental capitals; the arches were wrought chequer-wise of purple and yellow freestone, and the sweep of every arch was enriched with fretwork similar to that about the door frames of the porches. The arcade was open, and would admit of being converted to the same use as the battlements of our ancient castles. This was a style of architecture that peculiarly characterized the buildings ascribed to Bishop Gower and is observed in Swansea Castle, and parts of the old palace of Lamphey, structures that he is allowed to have been a great contributor to.

Of the palace of St David's on the present magnificent plan as traced in its ruins, he was the avowed founder, as the inscription on his monument testified; not that we can suppose there was no episcopal house on the site before his time; for we learn that some of his predecessors, men of high birth, in a style suitable to the occasion had the honour of entertaining kings there, but that he, with a zeal proportionate to the dignity of the see and his own elegant taste, was resolved to leave behind him a residence that would reflect lustre on his memory and worthy of the royal guests he, perhaps, expected to have the honour of entertaining, the then reigning Monarch, Edward the Third and his Queen Philippa, whose statues over the doorway of the principle porch now defaced and almost forsaking their pedestals, have been always miscalled King John and his consort, an error originating in a most unaccountable anachronism.

[Basement]

The basement story is made up of a series of curious and roomy vaults, in many of which the luxurious churchmen had, I make no doubt, a stock of rich wines "for their stomach sake" some were likewise the depositories of fuel and "omnis generis stuffuræ"

[archdeacon of St David's House]

Opposite to the north east of the episcopal quadrangle, and separated by the avenue from the Porth Gwyn, or the White gate is the house of the archdeacon of St David's within a court entered by a covered gateway, chiefly rebuilt in the time of Bishop Watson, his nephew Medley then filling that dignitary stall, and residing on it; but on the one side of the court there is an entire portion of the ancient building, seemingly the Chapel.

[Archdeacon of Brecon's house]

Farther on northward, in the same line is the archdeacon of Brecon's house, within a court also, and entered by a similar covered gateway. Over the porch of this house are escutcheons in carved stone, but blunted with annual whitewash, of the royal arms indicating it to be built in the time of Henry the Seventh, and the prelacy of Edward Vaughan. The builder was William Walter, the then archdeacon of Brecon, who, at the commencement of his work, being sarcastically referred to as having begun what he was not likely to accomplish, when, contrary to the opinions of people, he had finished the work, he caused to be inscribed on different parts of the building, both on wood and stone "Credite Operibus"

[Chancellor's House]

Still farther on in the same direction is the chancellor's house, recessed within a court, with its offices reaching to the north wall of the close. It has a great Hall as had the archdeacon of Brecon's with a dais or raised floor at the end, and is backed by good hanging gardens like the two former.

To the eastward of the chancellor's house, and divided from it by the road leading to Bunning's Gate, is the Archdeacon of Cardigan's ground, with its house a heap of ruin's for centuries.

[Treasurer's House]

To the southward of this, and divided from it by the road leading to St Mary's College, stands the treasure's house, with its offices, gardens, and curtilage, taking up a large space of ground. The whole was an awkward, incongruous aggregate of different periods, from the first establishment of the stall to the present time. It underwent much reparation in Doctor Clavering's time, who united the most disjointed parts, and gave it a more habitable air; but, to avoid the expense of keeping it up, grievously felt and complained of by his successors, this irregular pile has been of late years compressed into a convenient modern mansion. This building, as it was appropriated for keeping the plate and treasures of the cathedral, together with its offices and garden, was once inclosed for security by a high embattled wall of the same character with that round the close; and in the house there was a room called Ystafell yr Aur, or the Gold Chamber, which I presume had been the treasury.

A house annexed to the prebend of St Nicholas Penyfoes fills the space adjoining the bridge that succeeded the celebrated Llach lavar, or miraculously speaking stone, forming the rude passage over the river in the time of Giraldus; to which notwithstanding Henry the Second's contempt of its oracular powers, such sanctity continued to be attached to it for ages after, that it would have been deemed sacrilege to have removed it, or to have suffered it to give way to the profane substitution of an arch.

Crossing the bridge you enter the Quadrangle of the cloisters by a door, not, as in other cathedrals, opening into them from the Church, but from without.

[The Cloisters]

- When in being, were attached to the north side of the nave, but perfectly in ruins, there being only round the walls the remains of pilasters neatly wrought that united with the groined arches. The western cloister was formerly occupied by a free school and library, prior to it being removed to the room where now the audit is held, from which it was again banished to the chapter house.

The basement wall of the Chapel to St Mary's College forms the north side of the cloisters, from which by a grand ascent of steps under and through the first story of a square tower groined at the west end, there was a most noble entrance into the Chapel itself, as there was also a more private one from the College through the gardens in which it stood.

[collegiate chantry]

founded by John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, Blanch his wife, and Bishop Adam Hoton conjointly, but endowed by the Bishop alone with the advowson of several churches for the maintenance of a master and seven fellows, living in a collegiate manner, most solemnly binding themselves by oath strictly to adhere to such regulations as the founder had thought proper to establish.

The space allotted for this College was a square to the north of the cloister, bounded on the west by the river Alan, which washed the wall of its gardens; on the north by a high wall, in the midst of which was the entrance through a stately gateway; on the east side by a continuation of a similar wall to that of the north; and on the south side by the Chapel and its tower; a structure in the class of elegance and true proportions, and in every way worthy of its founders, if we may credit the fine remains.

[St Mary's College Chapel]

from east to west is sixty nine feet in length and in breadth twenty three ft nine inches, and the height of the side walls four ft five feet. It was lighted by three coined windows on each side, twenty four feet high and nine feet broad, with a somewhat larger at the east end though similar in form. From a MS. History of St David's in Latin, by one Tomkyn 1610 we find that those magnificent windows were decorated with painted glass representing the most memorable occurrences in the prelate's life; among others, pope Clement the Sixth excommunication of him, and in return, the Bishop's excommunication of the pope.

The height of the tower is seventy feet. The whole building was raised over a curious crypt, afterwards converted into a charnel house through which a rill of water constantly passes. The members had their separate houses vaulted beneath and surrounded by gardens. It was surrounded to the crown in the reign of Edward the Sixth, and now belongs to John Edwards of Sealyham esq., as lessee under the crown.

[Vicar's Ground]

Opposite to the chantry precinct and divided by a narrow passage only, is the vicar's ground now covered with ruins, where formerly they had their houses, their Chapel, and common Hall living in a collegiate manner as the minor Canons at Hereford, an institution that originated with the munificent founder of St Mary's chantry.

Having now led my Reader regularly through the ruins that dignify the outer close, and endeavoured from the faint vestiges the ravage of time has left, to retrace their former grandeur, I come to the only part not yet visited, the inner close, the cemetery, the more immediate precinct of the principal fabric, the venerable cathedral.

Many have been the accounts given of this ancient Church from Brown Willis's time to the present, and his, though it is known that he never was on the spot himself, being put together for his use by men of learning, natives of the place, and always though resident there, cannot fail to contain some valuable materials towards his plan, though teeming with numerous anachronisms, misrepresentations, and inaccuracies of every kind which subsequent writers endeavoring to make fewer, have only multiplied; so that Brown Willis's account may still, perhaps, be considered the fullest and purest source of information.

What can be said now must more or less, be an echo of what he and others have said before, particularly as far as relates to the form, division, and dimensions of the building in all its different parts. The subject is the same, and the mode of treating it will not admit of material variety. Therefore, all I have done has been to compare and digest what has already been given to the public; and to refresh my own remembrance of things and places familiar to me from an earlier time of life, by again going critically over the ground with the ingenious Mr Carter's Architectural Surveys; and a still more luminous guide in my hand, Sir Richard Hoare's account of St David's in his interesting comment on Giraldus, a circumstance that has afforded me the gratification of proving the minute correctness of the learned baronet, and I trust, will give my Reader, for a zeal that accounts nothing a toil which may tend to illustrate and give authenticity to the pages I am proud to devote to the history of this leading feature of my native place. Yet I do not presume to think, after all, that I can do more than rectify dates, inscriptions, wrong position of monuments, and such errors as a Long antiquarian acquaintance with the scene I refer to, and the sepulchral records whilst they were more perfect, and an opportunity of examining the earliest manuscript documents, may have enabled me to detect.

[The cathedral Church of St David's-- Fenton]

from some particular attachment to the primitive sanctity of the spot, was built in damp, boggy ground, nor was the veneration of the ancient site at all lessened when the present fabric rose under the auspices of Peter de Leia, who, to make room for the extension of the building eastwards, excavated the Hill till he bared the spring, the "origo mali" that fed the moisture which rendered it necessary to raise the building on piles. This spring, the miraculous Pistyll Dewi afterwards sainted, and referred to with superstitious veneration by Giraldus, and which, now choked with rubbish, I remember open, and yielding water of the finest quality, though not overflowing with wine or milk, was always most unaccountably suffered to lose itself under the Church, thereby continuing the mischief it was meant from the first to obviate or to remedy, and which must unavoidably hasten the downfall of the venerable fabric.

The building is cruciform, and with reference to its extreme length from east to west, the transepts are nearly in the centre on which the great tower wall according with the general design, rises. The grand and principal entrance, never used but on days of ceremonial processions is by a large door to the west end of the nave called the Bishops door; but the more accustomed entrance is on the south side by a porch, having a rich painted arch doorway; in the outer division of whose architrave there is a succession of small statues, and over the arch three large ones, The Deity in the centre and on each side a kneeling figure; but the sculptors' art is lost under the whitewash of ages. In a room above this porch the minor chapter keeps their records. Opposite to this entrance on the north side there is another door, not, as usual, opening into the cloisters, but a little way without them; but for a very obvious reason as the course of the river would not admit of the west side of the cloisters being brought out further so as to have taken in this doorway.

The whole fabric is divided into a nave with two side aisles. A choir occupying the area of a steeple, a north and south transept and chancel, with north and south aisle, coextensive with it and the Chapels to the east except the Lady's Chapel. The length of the whole building within the walls is three hundred and seven feet; that of the nave to the entrance into the choir one hundred and twenty eight ft six inches; of that portion comprehending the choir and chancel up to the high altar, ninety eight feet six inches. The breadth of the nave in the clear, sixty nine feet six inches Each transept is of the same dimensions forty seven feet by thirty three; but the external line of the aisles to the east on the transepts does not exactly range with that of the aisles of the nave, there being in its whole breadth a difference of two ft six inches in favour of the latter. But I will not trespass on the time of my Reader by too minute a detail, for I flatter myself that “de minimus non curare” with antiquaries of any taste is a maxim as well acknowledged as it is in law; for how can the mind, occupied with contemplation of the whole of this venerable fabric, have leisure to attend to every unimportant sub division, in settling the fraction of an inch and fritter itself away in pointing out and registering every trifling object of inferior ornament? To do this requires such frigidity of mental power as the cockney discovered when, sitting for his picture to an eminent artist and insensible to the effect of the portrait in general, he only remarked with great petulancy, that he thought justice was not done to the woof of his ruffles as they were Dresden lace of great price.

The entrance into the cathedral is awfully striking. The nave is of noble proportions and majestically simple, separated from the side aisles by two rows of arches, five Saxon and one pointed next the west end. The architecture of this portion of the edifice is chiefly of the Saxon style but of that peculiar kind when beginning to lose itself in the early pointed or English order. The arches of the gallery are a mixture of the Saxon and Gothic, but the latter here predominates. The several architraves to the upper and lower arches exhibits an innate variety of diagonals, frets and foliage; and however the form of the arch may vary, the Saxon decorations are still preserved Throughout the whole nave as well as the choir. The age of the nave we may fix to John's reign; but the Rood loft at the upper end of it adjoining the choir bespeaks the glorious era of the third Edward, being the most perfect specimen of this part of an ancient cathedral now left, whether we consider the peculiar elegance of the designer richness of the execution; the same ornaments here attract our notice as St Stephen's Chapel displayed before they became a wanton sacrifice to barbarous innovation. Nothing can exceed the beauty and lightness of the supporting front. In the centre is an archway leading into a porch, through which we enter the choir. On each side of this entrance there was the site of an altar with a rich screen; That on the left differing materially from the one on the right, yet both of fine taste, the whole ending in a highly wrought parapet.

The roof of the nave, substituted evidently instead of the original groins found to be in decay, and therefore lower, as appears by the lines of its former height, on the tower wall without, is of Irish oak of most singular and exquisite workmanship, and reflects great honour on the taste and spirit of Doctor Owen Pool, then treasurer, at whose expense, and under whose eye it was raised.

Under the fifth arch of the nave from the west end is the monument of Bishop Morgan, known only to have existed by that name among the pews that for a century had concealed it; but for whose, I may almost say, discovery and description, we are indebted to that ingenious artist and indefatigable antiquary Mr Carter, who represents it as well executed, the effigy in good preservation but the nose and hands. The sides of the tomb are enriched with statues of the apostles. His arms fill the west end; and at the east end there is a most exquisite basso relievo of the Resurrection, where the attitude of our Saviour is very striking and finely expressed. He died at Carmarthen, and having so ordered in his will, was brought hither to be buried on a litter, “super lectum” as I find in a MS., note of George Owen, who was his contemporary.

At the upper end of the south aisle, under an arch of singular construction, composed of four sides of a hexagon, which, instead of taking straight lines, have each a sweeping direction, is the effigy of a religious, Geoffrey Canton, who gave the tenement of Trepuet, near St Davids to the vicars choral; he lived in Bishop Tully's time. In the Bodleian papers that have preserved even the common annals, though “spelt by the unlettered muse” of the now obliterated pavements of the nave, I was much struck with the simplicity of the following inscription:

Here lieth the dust of John and Henry, sons of Mathias Adams, whom death made twins May 12 1700 (NB They dies of smallpox which at that time raged, and was very fatal. Mathias Adams lived at a place called Treleddydd Vawr.)

Under the rood loft, and covered with a groined canopy of choice workmanship, are three recumbent effigies, two on the right hand of the introductory porch and one on the left. The principal figure dignified by a mitre, is known to be Bishop Gower, to whose prelacy we owe the rood loft, and the mausoleum beneath it where he lies, and whose monument before the civil wars was ornamented with curious brasswork, and thus inscribed:

HIC JACET HENRICUS GOWER QUONDAM MENEV. EP. ET EPISCOPALIS PALATYII
CONSTRUCTOR QUI OBIIT 7 CAL. MAII, AD 1347, CUJUS
ANIME PREOPITIETUR DEUS REQUIM ET LECHEM SEMPITERNAM CONCEDENDO

The effigy next to Gower is said to be Chancellor Stradling, who died 1539; and the other on the north side of the porch treasurer John Lewis, who died 1541, and was Stradling's executor. The choir, perhaps the loftiest in the kingdom, takes up the whole area of the tower, which is supported on four immense arches, three pointed and one though now closed, once open to the nave, Saxon.

They differ likewise materially from those in the nave, as they spring alternately from columns circular and octangular; yet notwithstanding the arches vary, the Saxon mouldings prevail.

On entering the choir divided from the chancel by a low screen only, the eye is irresistibly attracted by the very rich and elegant design of the east window, where we trace a mixture again of the round and pointed orders, but mostly of the latter, where it seems to have got the ascendancy, though architects could not be brought to discard the former entirely; and I find by a note in Sir Richard Hoare's elegant and useful Essay on the Progress of Architecture, published at the end of his Itinerary of Giraldus, that it was not unusual to adopt the pointed arch so early as the period ascribed to the erection of this pile, for the abbey of Lanthony, in the year 1108 and the cathedral of Landaff, afford specimens to confirm it.

The high altar is approached by a graduation of ascent producing an awful effect. The floor is paved with the ornamental tiles, having escutcheons of arms and pious mottoes on them; and the roof of wood is curiously pointed and enriched with the arms of the different benefactors of the Church. In the choir the stalls of the dignitaries occupy the north south, and west sides, and consisted of twenty eight stalls, five on the right side of the entrance, and the same on the left, nine on the north, and as many on the south side. Under the seats of the stalls you find carved work, always ludicrous, but often bordering on the indelicate. The Bishop's throne stands in the south east Angle of the choir, and for workmanship is said not to be paralleled by any in the kingdom but that of Exeter. Almost opposite is the moveable pulpit standing on a stone in the pavement. (nb According to an eminent dignitary of St David's living at that time It was made by Morris Jones, carpenter, and Thomas Williams, joiner April 1697 the first sermon preached from it was on August 14th 1698)

On the floor near the throne a flat tombstone, once enriched with brasses, bore this inscription;
PETRA PRECOR DIC SIC
MORGANUS AP EYNON EST IIIC

He was archdeacon of Brecon AD 1389.

Beyond the screen separating the choir from the chancel, and exactly opposite the entrance into it, is an altar tomb like Prince Arthur's at Worcester, of Edward Tudor, Earl of Richmond, eldest son of Owen Tudor, by Queen Catherine, dowager to Henry V. who was by his half brother Henry VI created Earl of Richmond. Four years after he died, and was interred in the place then called Grey Friars, from whence at the dissolution of that house, his remains were removed, and the monument brought hither; but the brasses that ornamented and illustrated it fell prey to that fanaticism which was so severely felt all over the kingdom, and particularly in the churches. Yet the inscription which on a brazen plate ran round the rim of the tomb, as well as on its face, has been copied from a MS. of Sir Thomas Canon, to whose antiquarian industry is owing the preservation of all the monumental brasses of this cathedral, an obligation I never recollect to have seen acknowledged; the one round the rim in English differs a little from Brown Willis, and is as follows;

“Under this marble stone inclosed, resteth the bones of that most noble Lord Edmond, Earl of Richmond, father and brother to kings, the which departed out of the world in the year of our Lord god 1456, the first of the month of November. On whose soul Almighty Jesus have mercy”
The Latin epitaph is literally the same as that given by Brown Willis.

The tomb seems to be a piece of dark grey serpentine of the country, as the black and White particles are more minutely intermixed than in the limestone, our common marble; if so nothing can surpass the polish which that species of stone is capable of taking

On the left or north side of this tomb is St David's shrine, with very little of such richness now about it as usually characterized the shrine of saints, for its lower parts consist of a plain tomb, with no other decoration than four quatrefoil openings in a Row, two of which are stopped up. Above the basement are small divisions with columns, and on the spandrels of the arches, the heads of a King, a Bishop, and a monk. Yet simple as this structure now appears (and, perhaps, in earlier times its sanctity was such that it required no other attractions) here kings and heroes have humbly bent knee like meaner pilgrims, and made their costly oblations.

On the opposite side are the effigies of the two Bishop, Anselm and Jorwerth; the former having this inscription round the head

PETRA PRECOR DIC SIC' ANSELMUS EPISCOPUS EST HIC.

But towards the middle of the chancel, exactly opposite to each other, under plain recesses backed with elegant wood work screens, are the monuments of Rhys ap Griffith, commonly called the Lord Rhys, Prince of South Wales, and of his son Rhys Grug. Their effigies in armour are of freestone spiritedly sculptured, particularly the lion, the armorial cognizance of their breasts. The Lord Rhys's head rests on his helmet surmounted with a lion sejant sitting by way of crest but his son's on a pillow. As to the bar observed to cross the neck of the lion on the breast of the latter, it is meant for one of those heraldic marks or differences whereby bearers of the same coat of arms are distinguished from each other and their nearness to the principal bearer shewn called the Label. They are the first of the princes of south Wales who were interred in this cathedral, Straffleur Abbey having been their usual burying place before.

Within the communion rails is the monumnet of the treasurer Lloyd of the house of Milfield in Cardiganshire, and a mural marble tablet to the memory of chancellor Needham.

In the tower about the year 1720 there were five bells; one about four hundredweight tolled to prayers, the other four belonged to an entire peal, and had a treble and a tenor, the biggest then remaining was twenty two hundred weight. The bells were new cast in Gower's time, when the largest in taking down was said to have cracked the tower, and was lost at sea.

The north transept is at present a plain undignified building having only at the back of the stalls of the choir a small portion of it separated by a screen said to have been a penitentiary. Here under a canopy, is a plain tomb, having on its side two quatrefoil perforations, and recessed niches between seemingly for images, not unlike St David's shrine: votive offerings being made here as at that of the patron saint, the Church being dedicated to both St Andrew and St David.

The floor of this Chapel is peopled with modern gravestones, which even in my memory had some very ancient, of which not a trace remains; but in the beginning of the last century there were monuments under two plain canopies now filled up; and near a large tomb of grey marble, and another of fine White marble, with an effigy curiously sculptured, on it, and this inscription round it "HIC JACET MAURITIUS GLYN CUJUS ANIMAE....."

Another of handsome White marble, somewhat broken and defaced; on which all that was legible of inscription was

HIC JACET THOS.AP HOWELL IN ECC MENEV CANTONICUS ad 1490, CUJUS ANIME PROPITIETUR DEUS.

A little above it was a beautiful crucifix painted against the wall and the effigy of St St Andrew with his cross.

Under the great arch next the penitentiary there was a tomb of a dignitary with his effigy, of the name of Powell by tradition and under another arch, another plain tomb of a dignitary of the same name.

In the opposite and south transept, commonly called the Chanters Chapel, about the same period were visible five old grey marbles, one or two of them like stone coffins of very antique fashion; two others had on them ancient embossed heads; one only of those remains, with the head worn smooth and freshly inscribed to the modern dead.

We come now to the ruinous part of this majestic structure, all which I find in a MS. Letter to Brown Willis from Canon Stephen Lewis AD 1717 was in good repair, as he had been credibly informed by those who saw it up till the great rebellion, when the lead was stripped off and said to have been used about the Church of Cardigan and the priory house adjoining, then belonging to one of the sequestrators. The part now totally unroofed are the two side aisles of the chancel and the Lady Chapel, for Bishop Vaughans Chapel and the vestibule without it have their roofs entire but I fear ill covered.

The two opposite doors leading from the chancel to the unroofed aisles. In the north aisle facing the door by which you enter it there is a considerable flight of steps, by which you ascend to what was formerly the chapter house, but now converted into the free school. Under this is a room of the same dimensions, with an elegant groined roof, that might have been used for the audit entertainments of the chapter, as it has at the upper end a dais, as in College Halls for the cross table. That this building in its present external form has been the chapter house for these five hundred years there can be no doubt, as I have seen a to deed, dated so far back, the chapter seal with an impress of an edifice exactly resembling this.

The side aisles retain marks of groined roofs, windows of fine proportion, and other suitable decorations. But Bishop Vaughan's Chapel ranks with some of the most perfect specimens of the florid Gothic of that age. The roof is of freestone elegantly wrought, and as fresh as if lately finished. At the east end are two most beautiful niches, marking the site of the altar between them; on each side of which there is an oblique slit through the wall into the other Chapel, perhaps for the purpose of confessional. The west wall is perfectly plain. The north and South entrances had finely carved open screens once dignified as tradition says, with Green silk curtains. The Bishop was buried under a plain marble tomb of the country, with his effigy on a brass plate richly engraved.

The roof of what I have presumed to call the vestibule to this Chapel seems much more ancient than it is considered to be, in consequence of having in one of the intersections of its ribs an escutcheon with Sir Rhys ap Thomas 's arms with the garter, evidently placed there, together with the royal arms, in compliment to the reigning Monarch and the illustrious Welshman his powerful adherent and favourite, by Bishop Vaughan when he was adorning his own peculiar Chapel. Our Lady's Chapel founded or rather finished by Bishop David Martin, I remember with its roof nearly entire, but in a dangerous state of decadency; the work was singularly curious of which a few scattered fragments yet remain on the floor – knot of rabbits and some escutcheons of arms.

In the north aisle at the back of Davids shrine, observe a square niche between two quatrefoil openings as on the other side and arched niches lower down. A little higher up on the same side appear two canopies, once tenanted with effigies, closed up. The one exactly at the back of Rhys

Gryg's monument had an effigy of a priest with a lion at his feet, said to be Meredith Rhys's brother, a dignitary of this Church.

Just at the north entrance of Vaughan's Chapel there is an effigy of an ecclesiastic much weather beaten, as it lies since the aisle has been open, under the fall of a spout, supposed to be John Hiott archdeacon of St David's who died AD 1419. It appears as if this weather beaten effigy had lain under a rich stone canopy, broken in upon to make way for Bishop's Vaughan's splendid new work, as the ornamental moulding of half the canopy may be traced to its junction with the more modern freestone building. Over the effigy inserted in the wall is an admirable basso relievo of the crucifixion.

On the north side of the aisle near the east end of it where Sir John Wogan, when chief justice of Ireland founded a chantry dedicated to St Nicholas, under two sculptured arches are the effigies of a crusader and a priest, both supposed to be of the Wogan family, the latter probably David Wogan who occurs as chancellor of St David's

In our Lady Chapel on the south side under a rich stone pavilion highly ornamented with pinnacled buttresses, on each side is the monument of Bishop David Martin; and on the other side a recess stripped of its stone decoration, and monument it once enclosed supposed, but very erroneously (MSS Bib. Bodl.) to have been that of Bishop Adam Hoton, as he, by his will, directs his body to be buried on the north side of his own chantry Chapel, where it is evidently there existed a monument by a similar appearance on the wall there.

On the north side of the south aisle at the entrance into Vaughan Chapel is a mutilated figure of a crusader; and lower down on the same side in a mean recess the effigy of a priest, always taken as shewn for Giraldus, though there is much reason to doubt it. In the notes on St David's in the Bodleian library, it is said to be the figure of an ecclesiastic six feet high, by tradition one Mortimer, and supposed by the annotator to have been Edmond Mortimer, rector of Hodnet in Shropshire, mentioned in Digdale's Baronage, vol I.

On the south side of this aisle there are three canopied monuments, the first of a priest, whose effigy rests on a tomb, the side of which is ornamented with sculpture and seven escutcheons of arms in a Row within as many compartments. I am much inclined to suppose this to be the monument of Giraldus, who being a man of high rank, noble birth, and of princely alliance, might have been proud of displaying such pretensions on his tomb, and I never recollect to have seen that of a prince so decorated before. A plain tomb under the next canopy is that of Silvester, a physician, The last is the effigy of a priest holding a book, with an inscription in old French, now too much obliterated to be intelligible. This figure on a supposition that the book was introduced to characterize a scholar, Sir Richard Hoare is inclined to think might designate Giraldus.

[The old school converted into a Chapter house]

There is yet to be spoken of an ancient building on the south side of the cemetery, originally intended as a store room to hold materials for the Church, and the vault or basement has been always so appropriated, but the upper story, after the destruction of the school and library over the west cloister was fitted to supply its place and continued to do so for two centuries till it was converted into a chapter house and audit room by the late Mr Archdeacon Holcombe, from an ill directed zeal for innovation, remaining a sad monument of his total want of taste in Architecture. There was then a sort of charm about it to prevent the disgust it now excites. In this respectable character I was accustomed to remember it, and to associate with it a thousand other pleasing recollections of the scenes of my boyish days, and the companions of my mature years. [Fenton was a scholar there under Mr David Rogers]

— We are glad to learn that the spirit of restoration has visited the ancient metropolitical Church of Wales. Considerable improvements have been commenced, and are still in active progress. A fine Decorated window, from a design by Mr. Butterfield, has been inserted in the large opening at the extremity of the north transept, hitherto blocked up. Two Decorated windows have been placed in the aisles, both copied from an original example still remaining there. One of these is due to the munificence of the Rev. N. Davies, M. A., prebendary of St. Nicholas. The rood screen and loft are also being restored by a subscription, raised chiefly among members of the university of Oxford. The screen is the work of Bishop Gower, who built the palaces of Lamphey and St David's; and is a remarkably elegant specimen of Decorated stonework. Previously to the restoration it was in a most lamentable condition, being partly supported by heavy timber stays, and half blocked up with boarding. It is now rendered perfectly sound, and is cleared of its unsightly impediments. The entrance to the choir passes through the centre of the screen, under a stone ceiling of skeleton groining. The portion to the south of the entrance opens north, south, and west, by arches decorated with hanging tracery, and contains two tombs with groined roofs, divided by a traceried arch. Immediately north of the entrance there is a third tomb, surmounted, like the others, by a recumbent effigy of an ecclesiastic. The staircase to the loft is masked by the northern portion of the screen, and is approached by a doorway with an octagonal arch. In the front of the northern section there are three niches, which seem to bear a date prior to the southern portion. The arches have the vine-leaf moulding. The interior was originally painted; the crucifixion, the Evangelistic symbols, and other sacred devices, being still visible. It is intended to substitute a light gate of wrought iron for the unsightly doors that now occupy the choir entrance, to lay down the platform in front of the screen with encaustic tiles, and to relieve the stone work with polychrome.

A projecting cornice of oak has been substituted for the incongruous balustrade which previously disfigured the rood loft. The Norman choir-arch, which had been walled up for many years, has been opened down to the springing, and, it is hoped, will ultimately be entirely opened, and the decayed piers restored. The whole has been done under the able direction of Mr. Butterfield. Great praise is due to the Dean and Chapter for the zeal and activity they have shown in the restoration of their venerable fabric, and their readiness to accept and second the efforts of those who have contributed to the repairs. Much remains to be done ; we trust that this is but the beginning of a more complete restoration, and that it will hereafter be made the object of a diocesan or national subscription.

1863 The Restoration Of St Davids Cathedral - Camb Journal 1863 Report By Geo. Gilbert Scott. London, February 24, 1862 addressed To The Very Rev. The Dean And The Rev. The Chapter Of St Davids.

Rev. Sirs, I feel a peculiar pleasure in having been honoured by your directions to examine and report upon your venerable Cathedral, with a view to its thorough reparation. The interest attached to its early history, its great importance in relation to the history of the Church in Wales from the earliest periods to the present day, the sentiment of mystery and romance suggested by its strangely secluded position and severance from the busy world, its noble architectural character, and its present forlorn condition, unite in attaching to it an interest differing both in kind and in degree from what one feels for other Cathedrals ; while the task of bringing back a structure of such associations and such intrinsic merits to a state worthy of its importance, and that without destroying or detracting from its venerable aspect, is one in every way worthy of the most earnest and laborious endeavour.

The isolated position of your Cathedral, by removing it far from the abodes of wealth, and preventing its being known to more than a comparatively small number of persons, may in some degree militate against the success of the endeavours to raise the funds which are necessary to its restoration ; but when one considers the extent and, in many parts, the wealth of the Diocese of which it is the mother Church, I cannot for a moment doubt that, when its absolute necessities are made known, there will be an unanimous movement throughout the Diocese in its favour; when we further recollect its connection with the history of the Welsh Church, I feel sure that that movement must extend itself to the whole Principality, and, when added to these claims, we consider the extraordinary merits of its architecture, and the romantic interest which attaches both to its history and its situation, I feel sure that aid towards its restoration will not be wanting from all parts of the country, and that the seclusion and poverty of its immediate neighbourhood will be fully counterbalanced by the special claims and the special associations which belong to it. Sure I am that no lover of Church Architecture who can be prevailed upon to visit it will fail to be convinced of the necessity of the effort about to be made, or of the worthiness of your Cathedral of the utmost care and exertion to insure its perfect and permanent conservation, as well as of the importance, in a religious point of view, of making its condition such as befits the most important Church in Wales.

Without touching upon the earlier history of the Cathedral, of which no traces remain in the existing structure, I will commence by drawing a very slight sketch of the architectural history of the Church as it now exists, and of the changes through which its present form was attained.

The present structure was commenced about the year 1180, by Bishop de Leia, and the plan then commenced upon appears to have been exactly co-extensive with the existing building, with the exception of the Chapels eastward of the Choir and Transepts.

The period of rebuilding by Bishop de Leia was one of especial importance in the history of mediaeval architecture, being the exact juncture at which the Romanesque or round arched style was in a state of transition into the pointed arched style now vernacularly known as " Gothic." It was, of all periods of our old architecture, the one which is most strongly characterized by energetic effort and rapid advance. It was, in fact, the moment when art was being freed from the barbaric leaven of the dark ages, and refinement and true artistic feeling engrafted in its place.

In every part of our own island, as well as in France and Germany, the same determined effort after improvement displays itself in the buildings of this period. It was just before this that the Church of St. Cross, near Winchester, had been erected, which is a most marked type of this great transition. Simultaneously with the work at St Davids, the rebuilding of the eastern portions of Canterbury Cathedral was being brought to a conclusion in a manner which establishes it as one of the great landmarks of Church Architecture. At the same time, also, Archbishop Roger of York, and Bishop Pudsey of Durham, were carrying on the same great work of art reformation in the north ; while in the south it was being most gloriously pushed forward, in the rebuilding of the Abbey of Glastonbury, a work which evinces a very direct relationship to that at St Davids.

Remote as was the site of your Cathedral from the more active scenes of this great artistic movement, it is most interesting to observe, that it in no degree falls short of contemporary structures in the grandeur of its conception, or the beauty and refinement of its details. It lingers in some degree behind many of them in the extent to which the pointed arch has supplanted the round, but this was probably owing rather to a desire to avoid undue height, than to any actual want of advancement ; for in all the details, and especially in the carved foliage, the skill and taste exhibited is of first-rate order, and the execution of the ornamental masonry could hardly be excelled. Its architect, indeed, seemed determined to plant, in the furthest extremity of our island, the standard of the utmost advancement of his art, at the period of its most determined progression. These facts render the building a wonderfully interesting and valuable landmark in architectural history, taking, in the extreme west, a position parallel to that held by Canterbury in the extreme east of the island.

The whole of the building as erected at this period, was, so far as we can tell, prepared to be vaulted with stone, chiefly on the principle designated by Professor Willis as " Sexpartite " vaulting; but it would not appear that any part of the vaulting was actually carried into execution. It is not known how long the work, commenced in 1180, occupied in its completion; nor, indeed, whether it ever was actually completed. Unfortunately, in 1220, a sad catastrophe occurred to the new work, in the fall of the Central Tower, in which it would appear that the Choir and Transept suffered severe injury. We see very distinctly in the Piers and Arches which support the Tower, the evidences of the reconstruction after this catastrophe, the western Arch and its two Piers belonging to De Leia's work, while the Eastern Piers and the remaining; three Arches are the result of the reconstruction. I shall hereafter have to advert especially to this point, and to call attention to the unhappy consequences of leaving one side of the ruined Tower standing, while the other three were rebuilt.

The extent to which the Choir and Transepts were reconstructed after this misfortune, is anything but clear. That they underwent very considerable changes is quite certain ; but so much pains seem to have been taken to avoid diversity of style, that it is a very difficult task to define exactly which parts belong to the first and which to the second period. It may, however, be assumed (I think) generally, that the Choir owed its general design, as now exhibited, to the reconstruction after 1220, and that the same extended in a considerable degree to the eastern side of the Transepts. The difficulty of exact definition is rendered the greater by a second general reparation having been rendered necessary through the effects of an earthquake which occurred in 1248.

About this time, as it would appear, commenced the extensive addition of Chapels, which subsequently so much altered the eastern portion of the Church. The Chapel of St. Thomas of Canterbury was added to the east of the North Transept, though only a small portion of the original structure of it now remains. The Aisles of the Choir were at the same time prolonged far to the eastward, and connected towards their extremities by a cross aisle, having on its eastern side arches opening into (or prepared to open into) a Lady Chapel ; by which arrangement a void space, open to the sky, was inclosed between this cross aisle and the east end of the Choir, to avoid interference with the light of the East Window.

A few years later (about 1300) the Lady Chapel was either erected or greatly enlarged, by Bishop David Martin, thus bringing the Church to its present length, from east to west ; and it seems probable that the same Bishop carried up the Central Tower to within one stage of its present height, and I am disposed to believe that he also in a great measure rebuilt the Chapel of St. Thomas , and erected over it the Chapter House, with the storey which surmounts it. Bishop Gower, who held the See from 1328 to 1347, seems to have been one of the greatest builders of his time. Here, again, we seem to have a parallelism between the east and west of the country ; Gower being in South Wales the exact co-relative of Prior Alan de Walsingham in the Diocese of Ely, each carrying the style of the first half of the fourteenth century to its greatest perfection, and each having such an insatiable appetite for building, that we trace their hand wherever they had a chance of leaving the Mark of it. Gower, besides the re-erection of the whole of the stupendous Episcopal Palace, and parts of the Palace at Lamphey, and of the Castle at Swansea, set about a general work of assimilation of the somewhat discordant elements of which his Cathedral consisted. The entire Aisles of the Cathedral, whether of the Nave, the Choir, or the Eastern Chapels, seem to have been in a greater or less degree reconstructed and remodelled by him. Those of the Nave were both of them heightened, and one (the South Aisle) entirely rebuilt, and the great window of the North Transept was inserted ; indeed, it is by no means certain that the Chapter House and the storey of the Tower, which I have placed to the credit of his predecessor, may not really belong to this great reveller in the masonic art. During his time, too, the Rood-screen was constructed, and a considerable number of very rich and beautiful monuments introduced into the Cathedral.

In the succeeding century, and the commencement of that which followed it, a number of minor alterations were made, but the most important works were the conversion of the void space beyond the east end of the Choir, into a beautiful Chapel, by Bishop Lloyd , an improvement, however, dearly purchased at the loss of the East Window ; the re-construction of the Roofs generally, including the gorgeous Roof of the Nave ; the addition of a storey to the Central Tower ; and the introduction of the Windows in front of the South Transept.

By these alterations the Church may be said to have, in the main, attained its present form, all subsequent changes belonging rather to the history of its degradation than to its construction, and consisting mainly of the lapse of certain parts into a state of ruin, the clumsy reparation of other parts, and alterations for modern convenience carried out without taste or feeling. The most marked, however, of all the later works, is the rebuilding of the west End a work executed some sixty or seventy years back, with the best intentions, though, from the circumstances of the period, without that knowledge of the character of the building, which its satisfactory execution demanded.

Before I proceed to particulars, however, I will offer a few preliminary observations on the general principles by which I think we should be guided in the restoration of such a building.

The value of our ancient monuments, and the interest which attaches to them as the actual and authentic works of the great builders of the middle ages, have, in very many instances, been most seriously interfered with by injudicious restoration. Restorers, in their zeal to render their work complete, are constantly in danger of going too far. They often place before themselves one only of the axioms which have been laid down for the guidance of Church-builders and Church-repairers viz., that nothing can be too good for the House of God, and that we should admit of no defect in it, which we should object to in our own residences forgetting the other great axiom, that the works handed down to us from early ages have attained an historical value, and a sanctity from the long continuance of their sacred uses, which forbids us to deal with them in the mere business like and simply practical way in which we treat ordinary and more recent structures. The true course is to use our very best judgment in uniting these views ; and while bearing in mind that the high uses of the building forbid our acting towards it on the low principles of ordinary economy, remembering at the same time that the building we are dealing with has been rendered sacred as the scene of ecclesiastical events, through a long series of ages, that it is a great historical monument, and that it is an invaluable treasury of ancient art, of the history of which it forms one of the most precious documents. Acting jointly upon these two considerations, it should be our object, while taking every measure to insure the permanence and stability of the building, and treating it in every way in a spirit consistent with its high purposes, to use at the same time every possible means to preserve, untampered with, all its ancient features, and to avoid everything which would encroach upon the antiquity of its aspect, or obscure the evidences of its structural history. The following passage from Messrs. Jones and Freeman's History of the Cathedral, is most true of such restorations generally, and is doubly valuable as having been written with express reference to the work you have now in contemplation :

" When a work is not only completed, but by lapse of time and revulsion of feeling thoroughly stereotyped as an historical monument, it becomes a solemn trust, for our preservation, and if need be, our restoration. All change, not strictly included under the last term, is set down as to be in itself reprehended, only to be justified by special circumstances, the burden of proving whose existence rests in every case with the innovator."

The first great instance of dilapidation which I will notice, relates to the Tower, which, uniting as it does the four arms of the Church, is so essential to the stability of the whole, that any danger which affects it threatens in a greater or less degree the whole structure.

I have already alluded to the fact that, after the fall of the first Tower, in 1220, the two Eastern Piers, with three of the Arches, were rebuilt ; but the western Piers, with one Arch (subject to some increase of strength) were allowed to remain. This is always a dangerous expedient, for not only is it in such a case improbable that the remaining portion should be wholly exempt from the defects which caused the destruction of the rest, but a tower resting partly on new and partly on old work, can scarcely in the nature of things be thoroughly trustworthy.

Both these causes of failure have ever been in active operation. The old portions which remained have been constantly crushing and giving way, and the older and the newer parts have become disunited to a most marked degree, both of which unfortunate failings have been increased by the ponderous additions made to the Tower in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, additions which the defective western Piers were ill able to sustain. I have no doubt that the crushing of these Piers led to the addition of the massive stonework which backs the Rood-screen, and which has done much to preserve the Tower ; and at a later period the western and the Southern Arches were entirely walled up for increased security. Browne Willis says that in his day the Northern Arch was similarly treated, but I fancy that this must have been a mistake.

The present condition of the Tower is in the highest degree alarming, and till it is restored to a state of security, it is quite useless to think of any extensive reparation of other parts of the building.

The western Piers consist each of two portions, the parts toward the Nave belonging to De Leia's work of the twelfth century, and those toward the Transepts having been added after the catastrophe of 1220. Of these, the older or western portions are literally, at least so far as they are open to examination, shattered to fragments, and the same process has extended itself in a less degree into the later or eastern parts of each Pier ; in fact, the only security which the Tower has from actually falling, is the buttressing it sustains from the walls of the Transepts and the Nave, though the latter have themselves severely suffered under the undue pressure thus brought upon them.

The Arch facing the Nave is very much injured, and the wall which it sustains, up to the commencement of the latter stages, is utterly disintegrated; so much so as to render it dangerous very closely to investigate the defects ; and the same state of disintegration extends itself some feet into the North and South walls, but especially the former, which is at this point crushed throughout its whole thickness.

It will be seen from what I have stated, that the whole remaining portion of the first Tower is crushed and left at the mercy of the various walls which abut against, and so to speak, bolster it up ; and that this terrible failure extends itself to a certain distance into the later, and in themselves, better constructed portions ; in fact, that of the four supports of the Tower, two are sound, and two wholly untrustworthy.

The upper stages of the Tower appear to be, in themselves, strong and substantial ; but, being well supported towards the East, and ill towards the west, it naturally follows that a frightful crack runs up the North and South sides.

These cracks, however formidable they may appear, need not cause alarm as to the actual strength of these upper walls through which they pass ; but, as sympathetic of the radical evil which exists below, they are only too significant. I need hardly say, that to remedy the tremendous failure which I have just described, will be a very difficult and a very costly operation. It would be madness, in such a case, to attempt, any repairs without the previous introduction of such a system of shoring, as would, if necessary, be capable of sustaining the entire load which now rests upon the damaged Piers. It would be useless in this Report to give any detailed description of such a system of shoring. I have, however, most carefully considered it, and I believe, see my way pretty clearly to its construction.

The general course to be followed would be this :

First, to bind together the walls of the upper stages of the Tower with massive ties of iron, aided by stays of timber, so as to render it impossible for the walls to spread. Then to construct incompressible foundations, on which the shoring is to rest. Thirdly, to erect shoring of the most massive description under the North and west Arches (the South Arch remaining walled up as at present) and against the two western Piers, constructed on such a system (as before stated) as would be capable, if necessary, of sustaining the whole weight of that side of the Tower.

After this would commence the operation of reconstructing, in a greater or a less degree, as may be found requisite, the two western Piers. This would be done very gradually, and in small portions at a time, a moveable system of shores being used to sustain the work in immediate contact with the parts operated on, and capable of being shifted from time to time as the work rises. In this manner one Pier, with the walls immediately insisting on it would be repaired, (indeed in a great measure reconstructed,) and then the other would be undertaken in a similar manner, the main shoring remaining untouched till the entire work is accomplished.

This operation, I may mention, has been successfully performed in several instances, as at the Cathedrals of Hereford and Bayeux ; at Sherborne Minster ; at the Churches of St. Mary , at Nottingham, St. Mary , at Stafford, and at Aylesbury. The structural defects in the upper portions of the Tower will be readily repaired when the supporting Piers and Arches have been rendered substantial. They consist mainly of the reparation of the great cracks already mentioned, and of some minor defects in the walls ; the repairs of the timber- work of floors and roof; the re-leading of the roof; the restoration of the windows, parapets, pinnacles, and the architectural features, and cleaning off the external plastering, the pointing and general repairs of the exterior. When the whole is effected, the Southern Arch will be opened out, so as to open the South Transept to the Church.

I will now proceed to the Nave. This, Throughout its entire length has suffered materially from the sinking of the western side of the Tower. The effects show themselves most palpably in the parts (already alluded to) in immediate contact with the Tower, these are very much crushed, and must be repaired simultaneously with the Tower itself; but the same cause, aided probably by the defective foundation of the west end, has caused a westerly movement Throughout the whole of the Nave Arcade and Clerestory, throwing all the pillars out of the perpendicular, and crippling and damaging the Arches and many other parts. It probably went so far as to cause actual danger, which led to the reconstruction of the west end, and the addition of massive arched buttresses by Mr. Nash. This has probably been successful in checking the westward tendency, unless there should be a continued sinking of the Tower, but it has left the Pillars, Arches and Superstructure much shattered. Besides this westward tendency, the pillars and superincumbent walls also lean outwards, particularly those on the North side, which overhang considerably. This partial failure is of early date, for flying buttresses were added during the fifteenth century to counteract it. I fear that it would be useless to attempt to rectify either of these displacements, and that the utmost which can be done will be to prevent further movement, and to repair the direct injury which has been sustained by the stonework. The former may be effected in part by underpinning and strengthening the foundations of the Piers, and in part also by strengthening the roofs of the Aisles, so as to make them more efficient in affording abutment to the walls the latter will involve somewhat extensive repairs of internal stonework. Externally, the Nave requires much repair and restoration, as well as the completion of its cleaning from whitewash. The Clerestory, for instance, has been sadly mutilated ; its windows, some walled up, and some altered from their original forms, and the parapet entirely altered, and that in a most uncouth manner.

The Aisle walls also require some considerable amount of reparation. The parapets and pinnacles are in a very indifferent state, and the windows much altered from their original form, besides a considerable amount of decay in the stonework.

The North wall is buttressed by huge and uncouth masses of stonework. Some of these would appear to be connected with the ancient Cloister of the College. It will become a question whether these should be altered to something more sightly, or allowed to retain their present forms.

The exterior of the South Porch is in a wretched state, and would require a great amount of restoration ; the interior is much better, though still demanding reparation.

The west end has, as I have before mentioned, been entirely renewed, and that with very little regard to its old design. This old design can in some measure be recovered by the help of prints, &c. ; and I would recommend that, so far as is possible, it should be reproduced, though I think it may be wise to retain the arched buttresses, with some amelioration of their form.

The walls, pillars, and floor of the Nave are in a terrible state from damp. This arises in part from want of proper drainage, and in part from the defective state of the roofs. The subject of drainage I shall enter upon presently. As to the floor, it must be wholly relaid with better material laid hollow upon a stratum of concrete.

The roofs demand very careful treatment. That to the Nave proper is a most beautiful structure, but is very much decayed. The parts immediately adjoining the Tower will be required to be in great measure renewed : the ends of all beams must be carefully examined, and spliced where found decayed. The whole of the wallplates must be renewed, and generally all mortices and tenons. Throughout the roof must be examined and strengthened with iron, or by other means, where found defective.

The roof of the North Aisle is very rough and rude. That to the South Aisle is similar to it, but has, in addition, below it, the framework of an ornamental ceiling, but very imperfect, and it is possible that the same may once have existed on the North side. I think it probable that these roofs will have to be either wholly or in great measure renewed. The roof of the Porch must also be new. The roofs both of Nave, Aisles, and Porch, must be newly leaded, the old lead being recast.

The North Transept. The western wall, with the doorway which unites it with the Aisle of the Nave, has been much crushed by the pressure of the Tower, and will require careful reparation. This wall has two windows walled up, one of which is pretty perfect, but the other is very much mutilated ; these must be reopened and restored, as also must the doorway which is blocked up. The internal stonework requires general repairs and cleansing. The floor has been raised a foot or eighteen inches, and must be lowered and renewed as described for the Nave.

The bases, &c., of Eastern Arches are much mutilated.

The exterior requires very extensive repairs.

The roof is most wretched, and must be entirely renewed and remodelled.

The South Transept has been much disfigured by being converted into a separate Church, and requires treatment very parallel in its degree and nature to the --

North Transept. The entrance to this Transept from the exterior and its eastern Aisle are entirely innovations upon the original design, and must be remodelled, and if possible restored to their original form.

Some parts of the exterior are so ruinous as to be covered by a thick growth of shrubs.

The Choir or Eastern Arm. The interior stonework is not in very bad condition, but requires the reparation of broken, decayed, or mutilated portions, and the entire cleansing from whitewash. The Arcades are at present walled up in consequence of the unroofing of the Aisles ; these must be opened out with great care, not disturbing the lower parts, which are ancient, and contain tombs of great interest.

The North Aisle has recently been roofed, but in a somewhat homely manner, and is covered with slate, for which its pitch is insufficient. This roof must receive some improvements, and be leaded. The wall of this Aisle is in a sad state of mutilation and disfigurement, its windows were altered into a debased form during the seventeenth century, and have since been walled up. These must be thoroughly restored according to evidences which exist of their ancient design. There is a modern doorway which it would be desirable to do away with, if it could be spared. If not, it must be replaced with one of good design.

The entire arrangement of the entrance to St. Thomas ' Chapel is modern, and the approach to the staircase which once led to the Chapter House above it is stopped up by a water closet; all this must be brought back to its ancient form.

(I may here mention that there is an ancient "guard robe" or necessarium, in connection with the Chapter House above.)

The South Aisle of the Choir is partly a ruin, and partly converted into a Porch, or thrown into the modern Church which has been formed out of the South Transept. It must be brought back to its ancient form, re-roofed and restored. The Aisles must, of course, be newly floored, but the Eastern Arm itself has a fine old pavement of encaustic tiles, which must be most carefully preserved. I may here mention in passing, that one of the Altar steps retains the mortice which received the lectern for the Gospels and Epistles, a very rare and valuable relic of ancient ritual usage. The original East Windows were in two ranges ; a beautiful triplet below, and a group of windows (now lost) above ; the former was walled up by Bishop Vaughan ; the latter was, in the fifteenth or sixteenth century, converted into a window in the style of that period, and this being now quite decayed, will require renewal. The roof of the Eastern Arm is of the same age as the window last named, and bears the arms of Bishops Tully and Richard Martin, A.D. 1461-83.

It has very much sunk and has been strengthened by some most unsightly arched braces of timber. These must be removed, and some effectual means be taken to strengthen the roof without adding deformity. The roof will require very extensive repairs, including new plates, and (as all other roofs) must be re-leaded. This roof, as nearly every roof on the Church, differs greatly in form and pitch from the original. The walls which sustain it have been very much raised beyond their original height, and a low pitch substituted for the original high one.

The Exterior of the Clerestory and its parapets, and of the East End, require considerable reparation. The East End contains very interesting and beautiful remains of its original structure, and of the older East Window on the upper range, though not sufficient to indicate with certainty and completeness its ancient design.

We now come to the various Chapels, &c., which have at different times been added to the original Church.

I will take first the building adjoining the North Transept, which contains on the ground floor the Chapel of St. Thomas , and above, the Chapter House, and another still higher chamber. This building is mainly of the fourteenth century, and was very beautiful in design, but has been reduced to a very wretched condition, and its upper portions are little better than a ruin.

St. Thomas ' Chapel itself is comparatively in tolerable condition, though it has lost its original windows, and requires the same general cleansing and reparation of stonework, &c., with the rest of the Church. The Arch, which formerly united it with the Transept, has been walled up, and should be opened out, and a suitable screen substituted for the wall. The Chapel should be re-floored with stone.

When we get to the next floor the case is very different. The ancient Chapter House has long been converted into a boys' school, and has been reduced to the condition which such a use would lead one to expect. Instead of being approached, as formerly, by a winding staircase from the Church, it is now entered by a hideous flight of external steps, which block-up the Aisle windows, and it has a modern door-way cut through the wall.

The ancient floor over the Chapter House has been destroyed ; the roof (itself modern) is ready to fall in; the windows have been deprived of their tracery ; the parapets, pinnacles, &c., are in a state of absolute ruin ; indeed, the whole building may be almost correctly described in the same terms. Happily, enough remains, in all probability, for the recovery of the entire design, though a single Winter may seriously reduce the amount of evidence. It is almost superfluous to say that the entire building must be put into a perfect state of repair, and brought back in every respect to its original form.

I now come to that curious group of Chapels which form the eastern termination of the building. Here we have to go upon very difficult ground, nearly the whole having long been in a state of unmitigated ruin.

In this condition, it is quite clear that they cannot be allowed to remain ; and the problem to be solved respecting them is, how to recover their original forms and features, and how to bring them into a state of reasonable, seemly, and permanent reparation, with the least possible interference with the interest which attaches to them as relics of antiquity. This is, beyond a question, a task involving very great difficulties; but I think that, by extreme care and caution, it can be pretty satisfactorily effected. It is a work in which one must rather feel one's way, step by step, than lay down any very distinct course to begin with. The first step would be to repair those walls which seem to retain a Fair amount of strength, to examine and open out the blocked-up windows, to search for remnants of their tracery ; and having recovered their design, to restore them, bringing in such portions of old work as are capable of being retained. The next parts to be dealt with are those of more doubtful substitutability ; and with these the object to be aimed at will be to recover their strength without reconstruction. A remainder will probably be found to exist, of parts whose condition demands their renovation ; and here the object will be to reconstruct them exactly according to their original forms, and in such a manner as best to accord with the old work around them. I am of opinion, by thus carefully, and, I may almost say, timidly, feeling one's way, the walls may be brought back into a Fair state of reparation, without seriously infringing upon their originality and the ancient aspect. The roofs must then be added, and here will at once arise the question, whether the roofs are to be exposed to view internally, or whether we should make any attempt to restore the vaulting. This, happily, in two instances (Bishop Vaughan's Chapel and the vestibule to the Lady Chapel), remains, and there can be no doubt that it has once existed over the Lady Chapel itself. It may be doubtful how far, with all our reparation, the old walls could be trusted to bear the weight and thrust of stone vaulting, and I should incline to the expedient for which we have numerous ancient precedents of forming the vaulting in oak upon the old stone springers. This effected, we should see the interior of these Chapels resume very much of their original appearance, and could then proceed to apply the same careful and tentative principles of restoration to their minor details, and to the interesting and most valuable series of tombs which they contain. In dealing with these, however, I would urge the most conservative course. If in any degree renewed, their interest would be lost; they must be preserved as shattered and time-worn relics of the past, and little more done to them than is necessary to secure them against further mutilation and decay. For the latter purpose, the course followed in dealing with the Royal monuments at Westminster Abbey would probably be applicable to them. I mean the saturation of the pulverizing stone with an indurating solution.

The whole of these Chapels will, of course, require new flooring; and the small portion which has a roof will require that that roof should be thoroughly repaired.

The remarks I have above made respecting the decayed and mutilated tombs applies, though in a modified degree, to the ancient monuments throughout the Church. These must be repaired, protected, and cared for, but not restored. There are a few arched tombs, of which the arches have been partially destroyed ; these must, of course, be perfected; but generally speaking, very little new work should be introduced in dealing with monuments, whose authenticity is a grand element in their value.

I will now proceed to the internal fittings.

The Stone Screen of the Choir, the work of Bishop Gower, and in part his monument, is in a Fair state of repair. It will be somewhat disturbed by the repairs of the Tower Piers ; but every part thus disturbed will be carefully replaced. The Stalls of the Choir, the work of Bishop Tully, are in a tolerable state of preservation, but will require general and thorough reparation, including the renewal of their floors, &c.

The Bishop's Throne is in a very decayed and disjointed condition, and will require very extensive repairs and the renewal of some portions, as also will the Eastern Screen, which divides the Presbytery from the Choir proper.

This Screen is very remarkable, being, I believe, unique in its position, and therefore particularly valuable as a relic of ancient ritual arrangement.

The miserable pews, which now disgrace the Choir, must, of course, be done away with, and any Seats which may be necessary, in addition to the Stalls, must be made of a very light and moveable character, showing plainly that they are introduced from necessity alone, and not as a permanent portion of the arrangement. Perhaps, as the Southern Arch, will then be open, the Organ may be transferred to that side, and be used by the Congregation at the Welsh services, if the South Transept be still considered the most convenient place for them. In any case, I may mention, that the fittings of the part allotted to the Welsh services must be new, and of appropriate character and arrangement.

There are some questions open to consideration, as to matters involving a certain degree of departure from the forms in which some parts of the building have come down to us. One of these I will state in its broad form. All parts of the building, or nearly all, have been either vaulted with stone, or prepared for such vaulting. In a great majority of instances, this has never been carried into execution. The question arises whether, in a restoration of the building, it would be right and expedient to carry out this intention of its builders, or, if the walls are considered insufficient for its support, whether the intended forms may not be carried out in oak.

Against either of these proposals there are, as regards the Nave and Choir, objections; in the one case insuperable, and in the other of considerable force. As regards the Nave the objection is twofold ; first, the walls are not in a condition to support stone vaulting; and, secondly, the existing roof is so beautiful as to render the idea of any change absurd.

As concerns the Choir, the objections are less decisive, though still strong. The walls, it is true, seem substantial, but the addition of stone vaulting would, nevertheless, be a rash experiment. The objections to timber vaulting are in this case the uncertainty which here exists as to the design of the once intended vaulting, and the existence of a roof which, though not particularly firm, and in bad condition, possesses, nevertheless, some beauty and historical interest, and is susceptible of reparation.

Such objections do not, however, exist as regards the transepts. It would not certainly do to add stone vaulting to them, but I see no objection here to completing the original design in oak. The roofs are worthless and must be renewed, and the indications of the design of the intended vaulting are clear. I think, therefore, that the most reasonable course would be to make perfectly plain roofs, and to conceal them by oak vaulting, similar in form to what was originally intended in stone. This is a course which was adopted in very many cases by the mediaeval builders, when their walls were found insufficient for the support of the intended stone vaulting.

The application of the same principles to the Aisles of the Nave and Choir is one on which I will not offer so decided an opinion. The case differs as regards the several portions. On the south side of the Nave there is no hindrance at all to the carrying out of timber vaulting, the only argument against it being the existence, though in an almost ruined condition, of a panelled ceiling. On the north side there is not even this objection, but another comes into force ; I mean the fact that the vaulting would intersect, perhaps somewhat awkwardly, with the stone flying buttresses which here show within the Aisle.

As regards the Aisles of the Choir the only difficulty lies in deciphering the evidences of the ancient design, which here present an enigma of no ordinary difficulty.

In one instance in the Cathedral, the system of placing timber vaulting upon stone springers has been carried out by the old, though not the original builders. I refer to the vaulting within the Tower. Unhappily it has here been so ill-managed that one cannot help wishing it away, for it has been made to cut the fine windows of the lantern across, at less than half their height. I suppose, however, that this design must be borne with.

I will now proceed to a very important practical question, as yet only incidentally referred to. No one can at present enter the Cathedral, excepting after a long continuance of dry weather, without being shocked at the fearful state of dampness (to use the feeblest expression) which pervades every part of the interior. I do not hesitate to say that I have never witnessed any thing approaching to it in any other Church. The walls, the pillars, and the floor, seem in damp weather perfectly saturated with wet, and after a few hours of heavy rain they, in many parts, literally stream with water. The first question is, how far the reparations already enumerated will remedy this most crying evil. To a certain and even to a considerable extent, I have no doubt they will do so. The perfect covering of the Roofs will prevent the direct ingress of water through them, which exists at present in most parts of the Cathedral. The reparation and perfecting of the external walls, and the doing away with the ruinous portions which at present admit wet, and harbour a luxuriant vegetation, will, again, do much ; the roofing over the ruinous Aisle of the Choir, and of the ruined Chapels beyond it, will abate one enormous cause of damp; a proper system of carrying off the water from the roofs, and of drainage to draw it rapidly away from the building ; and the lowering of all undue accumulation of earth from around the walls, will, again, do much good ; and the relaying of the greater part of the pavements upon a bed of concrete, will reduce the dampness of the floors still, however, there will be a remainder which will demand special measures for its abatement. The position of the building is one which naturally promotes dampness, through the soakage of the Hill, to the east and south, draining itself through the low ground on which the Church stands, and thus forming a constant underground stream below its foundations and floors, which is constantly drawn up by capillary attraction into the walls, pillars, and pavement. Some decided measure is needful for the prevention of this great evil. The most efficient measure appears to me to be the formation of a very deep drain on the east side of the churchyard, so constructed as completely to cut off the water which descends from the Hill, and prevent its soaking under the Church ; and of two drains in connection with the same, conducting the water by the north and south of the Church to the river on the west.

By these means, the Church, being surrounded on three sides by a deep and perfectly formed drain, and on the south by a rapid stream at a low level, would become insulated, and cut off from the constant filtration of water beneath it, and would, I feel sure, gradually become freed from the plague of dampness under which it at present suffers.

One thing more, however, is required to perfect this work. A certain amount of dampness arises from condensation upon the cold surfaces of the stone. To prevent this, and to make the Church wholesome and consistent with comfort, it must be warmed. I will not at this moment give a decided opinion as to the best system of effecting this, but there can be no great difficulty about it, and it is a really necessary measure, and one which will conduce greatly both to the duration of the structure, and to its practical efficiency for its sacred uses.

I may also mention, as naturally following the warming of the building, that the lighting of it must be provided for on an efficient as well as a handsome and consistent system.

I think I have now touched upon everything but that you can bestow upon it.

I estimate the cost of the work above particularized, at from 27,500 to 30,000, according to the mode of carrying out certain parts of the work which have been left as open to consideration.

I have the honour to be, Rev. Sirs, Your very faithful Servant,

GEO. Gilbert SCOTT. London, February 24, 1862.

St Davids CATHEDRAL CLOSE--- RCAHMW 2005&2007

The close, or precincts of the Cathedral of St David's, occupies an irregular area, some 300m across, within the valley of the Alun; a map of 1720 is thought to substantially depict the later medieval arrangements: bounded by precinct walls of a military aspect : the Cathedral set within its churchyard, occupies the central part of the close south of the river, with the former Bell-tower, now incorporated into the Porth-y-Twr in the precinct walls, set on the edge of the valley above; the Cathedral school was situated on the west of the churchyard: north of the Cathedral are the extensive remains of St Mary's College , with scant traces beyond of the Vicar's College; south-west of the Cathedral the present Deanery is thought to incorporate elements of the earlier 'Chaunter's' house & offices, with the site of the Archdeacon of Carmarthen's house & offices and the Chaunter's Orchard to the north : north of the river the Bishop's Palace & its grounds occupy the western quadrant of the close, to the east of which were the houses & grounds of the Archdeacons of St Davids & Brecon, of the Treasurer & Chancellor : other features include bridges over the Alun & river walls . J.Wiles 20.01.05

St Davids cathedral sits at the heart of a very old and largely intact close, encircled by a strong wall with fortified gates. The close contains the fine ruins of a once lavish Bishop's Palace, now a protected ancient monument, and a complex of houses and lodgings for the archdeacons and other clerics to the north of the cathedral. Also within the close are a cemetery, a silted fish pond and original tracts of meadow unencumbered by any later development or infilling. The entire complex is still bisected by the River Alun, which is crossed by a Ford in the centre below the cathedral. When Fenton visited he wrote: `This close was in circuit twelve hundred yards, had a walk round with a crenelled parapet. The entrance was by four handsome gateways or porths, answering to the four cardinal points" The present wall was probably that built by Bishop Bek (1280-93), and of the four fortified gates, Porth Boning on the north side, Porth Gwyn on the north-west, Porth Padrig to the south and the twin towers of Porth y T'r to the east, the latter can still be seen and still functions as a main entrance from the city.

Precinct walls, having a defensive aspect, of St David's Cathedral close : the present walls are thought to have been constructed in the later 13th century and remodelled in the late 14th century: modern walls follow the course of the precinct wall in places. Visible remains include: Porth-y- Twr ; Pont Cerwyn Dewi Tower (22619); dovecote tower .

The Chanter's Orchard area of St David's Cathedral Close formerly contained two houses of the members of the chapter. It became a garden by the end of the 15th century. The fishpond along side the river Alun is probably 18th century. The paddock shows evidence for building platforms and land divisions. C.H. Nicholas, RCAHMW, 24th August 2006.

St David's Cathedral; --- RCAHMW

The present St David's Cathedral building mostly dates from 1180 to 1220, although alterations and additions were made between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries. The west front is a nineteenth century restoration intended to recreate the original Norman front following an unsympathetic rebuilding by Nash. There is a fine early sixteenth century roof to the nave. The cathedral is one of the earliest British examples of a combined triforium and clerestory. It is the most important medieval ecclesiastical building in Wales. The Cathedral stands at the centre of a complex of medieval and later structures and buildings, enclosed by the precinct wall , these, with the associated borough without, comprising the medieval and later city .

St David's Cathedral Timber Felling date ranges

(a) Tower Felling date ranges: 1248-1278; 1273-1303; 1286-1316; 1287-1317; 1303-1333 (b)

Bellframe Felling date: Spring 1386

(c) Nave roof ceiling boards Felling date ranges: 1434-1474; 1445-1475 (d) Nave roof-trusses

Felling date ranges: 1501-1531 to 1544-1574

St David's is a complex multi-period cathedral best appreciated through the detailed account by Roger Worsley in The Buildings of Wales: Pembrokeshire (2004) and the lavishly illustrated St Davids Cathedral 1181-1981 (1981) by Wyn Evans & Roger Worsley. Three major elements were sampled; elements not sampled included the screens and stalls, the timber vault at the tower crossing, and a currently inaccessible fragment of early roof (ex inf. Jerry Sampson). The dating was commissioned by RCAHMS as a centenary project with the support of the Dean, the Very Rev. J. Wyn Evans.

The three-stage tower is of several builds. The original tower partly collapsed in 1220 (?) and was rebuilt in at least two phases, the second stage with ballflower ornament is 14th Century and the upper stage with belfry, parapet and pinnacles dates from circa 1500. The ceiling bracing of the clock chamber below the belfry was sampled. Jowled posts rising from corbels with large curved timber braces support the main beams of the Bell-chamber floor; the joists pass over the beams. The braces are apparently in situ (though many of the joists are reused) and date from between 1300-1325. This presumably dates the initial reconstruction of the tower.

The bellframe in the chamber above was adjusted and expanded in the 19th Century (painted date of 1852) but incorporates much material from an earlier bellframe constructed from timber felled shortly after 1385. The bellframe is earlier than the belfry in its present form and must have been reframed more than once, as redundant mortices confirm. The bellframe, which requires further study, is the earliest known in Wales and one of the earliest identified in Britain.

The nave roof is an important 'pendant ceiling', the object of much admiration since the later 16th century. It is secular in type (appropriate for a great Hall) with a strongly marked Renaissance character, especially in the detailing of the pendants and in the innovative structural form of the trusses. The ceiling of twelve bays, each with ten boarded panels, is suspended from the tie-beams of low-pitched King-post trusses numbered I-IX on the ridge-beam. The King-posts are 'joggled' to receive the principal rafters but are not braced. These may be the earliest King-post trusses of Italian type surviving in Britain. It has been suggested that the roof is of Flemish workmanship, made from Irish oak; however, cross-matching showed that the roof was made from Welsh rather than Irish oak, although the roof certainly has a Continental (Renaissance) character.. A more detailed account of this roof is in preparation.

Sampling gave an unexpectedly complex series of dates ranging from the mid-15th Century to the mid-16th Century. The timbers had been defrased (probably in the 19th Century) and felling dates were estimated from the heartwood-sapwood boundary. The felling-date ranges indicate three phases: (1) a stockpiling phase in the first quarter of 16th Century; (2) a construction phase in the second quarter of the 16th Century; (3) a phase of repair and consolidation in the mid-16th Century.

This complex sequence is consistent with the documentary sources; these indicate that the roof was commissioned before 1509, was partly constructed by the 1530s, but that work stopped between 1536 and 1548.

Unexpectedly, tree-ring dating shows that the ceiling boards (feather-and v-edged, and numbered) are earlier than the ceiling beams, and had been reused from an earlier ceiling or timber-vaulted roof of circa 1450, possibly the predecessor nave roof.

St Davids--- RCAHMW

The westernmost peninsula of Pembrokeshire is dominated by the city and cathedral close of St Davids, spiritual home of the patron saint of Wales, which has stood as a place of religious sanctity and pilgrimage for well over a millennium. In medieval times it was said that two pilgrimages to St Davids were equal to one to Rome. The site of St David's original early Christian community, thought to have lain west of the city, has Long been lost to history and archaeology and has passed into the realms of legend. This early community was short-lived, however, and was soon moved inland to the banks of the River Alun where the cathedral stands today. By the ninth century St Davids or Menevia was a famous Welsh Monastery and a cult centre for followers of the famous saint. While the earliest sections of the cathedral date back only to the twelfth century, it is thought likely that the layout of the medieval cathedral close wall may have followed the line of the pre-existing religious enclosure.

The cathedral sits at the heart of a very old and largely intact close, encircled by a strong wall with fortified gates. The close contains the fine ruins of a once lavish Bishop's Palace, now a protected ancient monument, and a complex of houses and lodgings for the archdeacons and other clerics to the north of the cathedral. Also within the close are a cemetery, a silted fish pond and original tracts of meadow unencumbered by any later development or infilling. The entire complex is still bisected by the River Alun, which is crossed by a Ford in the centre below the cathedral. When Fenton visited he wrote: 'This close was in circuit twelve hundred yards, had a walk round with a crenelled parapet. The entrance was by four handsome gateways or porths, answering to the four cardinal points' The present wall was probably that built by Bishop Bek (1280-93), and of the four fortified gates, Porth Boning on the north side, Porth Gwyn on the north-west, Porth Padrig to the south and the twin towers of Porth y T'r to the east, the latter can still be seen and still functions as a main entrance from the city.

Granted city status by Queen Elizabeth the Second on 1 June 1995, and with a population of less than 2,000 inhabitants, St Davids is now recognised as the smallest city in Britain.

St Davids Bishops Palace--- RCAHMW

St Davids was the largest and most important medieval diocese in Wales. The cathedral housed the relics of the sixth-century saint, David, patron saint of Wales, and attracted substantial numbers of pilgrims, including King William I. Until the appointment of Bishop Henry de Gower in 1328, it is unsure where the bishops lived. De Gower erected two separate ranges of rooms, one for his own private and a second suitable for ceremonial occasions, where he could entertain important guests and distinguished pilgrims to St Davids. Both sets of chambers were built at first floor level above vaulted under crofts and entered by elaborate porches. The crowning glory, however, was still the distinctive chequered arcaded parapet, which, although faded, still has the effect of unifying the group of buildings.

There seems to be no evidence of building work since the death of de Gower in 1347 apart from the close wall and gates being repaired by Bishop Adam de Houghton between 1362 and 1389.

Increasingly, Bishops stayed less at St Davids and by the middle of the sixteenth century, the chief Episcopal residence was at Abergwili, Carmarthen.

In 1616 Bishop Milbourne applied for a licence to demolish some of the buildings and although the work was not carried, the buildings were considered in a poor condition.

Later in 1678, when Bishop William Thomas sought another licence to demolish the palace, it was beyond repair.

St Davids Cathedral Close, Porth-Y-Twr--- RCAHMW

Porth-y-Twr, or 'Tower Gate', forms the principal entrance from the borough of St Davids into the Cathedral Close. The defensive gate was probably added to a late thirteenth century two storey octagonal Bell tower in the fourteenth century. The Bell stage has large pointed openings with hoodmoulds and there are studded plank doors to the lower stage. The gateway and southern tower, to the south of the Bell tower, were constructed from rougher rubble stone. The south end is rounded and the eastern front has a big segmental pointed arch over the roadway. The tower was restored in 1929 and several early Christian crosses and inscribed stones are housed in a lapidarium in the gatehouse.

St Davids Cathedral Close; Archdeacon Of Cardigan's Ground --- RCAHMW

Originally a house occupied the site, which may have been built following the ordinance of Bishop Bek. It was still occupied in 1504 but was destroyed by 1691. The paddock has a raised platform at its western end.

Archdeacon Of Carmarthen's House--- RCAHMW

Situated in what is now known as the Chanter's orchard (in Eastern half). Represented by an expensive series of ranges whose outlines show on Lord's map of 1720. House was ruinous by 1585.

Archdeaonry, St Davids --- RCAHMW

Early to mid 19th century house: 2-storeys 3-bays with a slate hipped roof and end stone stacks. 12-pane sash windows with stone voussoirs. Central entrance.

House, as above, built on site of Archdeacon of St David's house & offices, as depicted on map of 1720.

Brecon House, St Davids--- RCAHMW

Early to mid 19th century. Contemporary staircase, fireplace. With early to mid 19th century coach house: single storey with loft. Stone walls. Modern double doors to the left and a small single door to the right, both with stone voussoirs. A central paned casement window to the loft. . Contemporary with house, high stone rubble wall, with blocked centre gateway. Garden walls & piers, as above, associated, together with coachhouse , with Brecon House: the walls appear to perpetuate something of the lines of enclosure of the earlier Archdeacon of Brecknock's house & offices, as shown on map of 1720.

The Town Cross

Standing at the foot of the High Street, a little above the Tower Gate into the close. An octagonal shaft rising from a base of six steps, and carrying a modern head. Local tradition asserts that it was formerly the custom to take the bodies of dead persons round the cross on their way to burial in the cathedral precincts :- visited 29th September 1921.

Features of Varying Uses and different periods

RCAM St Davids Cathedral

The Font

This “consists of an octagonal Basin of marble, ornamented with a rude arcade of sixteen pointed arches. The original shaft is destroyed” Jones and Freeman p77

A Small Oak Chest

A small and rude oaken chest of the commencement of the 16th century is preserved in the north aisle of the choir. It is altogether too insignificant to have formed part of the Cathedral furniture, but was probably brought from one of the small churches, where it may have been used for the offerings of the pilgrims, when the Chapels were deserted.

Pre Norman Stone Monuments

With reference to the carved and inscribed stones which are the sole remaining evidence of a previous Church standing upon the site of the present Cathedral.

Two stones used in the field walls of the neighbouring farm of Pen Arthur prior to their removal to the Cathedral in the year 1885. The farm is about midway on the direct road between St Davids and the site of St Patrick's Chapel on the verge of Whitesands bay, and there can be no doubt but that the stones came originally from that site. The largest stone bears the Greek Alpha and Omega followed without stop by the sacred initials I H S above the left hand quadrant of the cross and XPS above the right hand quadrant. Below the circle is the word GURMARC. On the reverse side of the stone is an incised cross of unusual form

Three carved stones were found during the restoration. One is near the style of the carved fragments at Penally. The other two are both of the same period and probably the work of the same craftsman. One of them is especially important as it bears the names of those it commemorates , and whose dates are known. On either side of the upper arm of the cross which crowns the large and elaborate wheel cross below it, can be seen the Alpha and Omega characters, and beneath the transverse arms on either side are the sacred monograms IHS and XPS which are also present on the Pen Arthur stone. In the space on the left of the small cross are the words Pontificis Abraham. Filii. hic. Hed et Isac. Quiescunt (Here lie at rest Hed and Isac, the sons of Bishop Abraham).

Abraham is said, in the Welsh Brut, to have died in 1078. This the stones, can with absolute certainty be dated to the last twenty years of the 11th century.

Tombs and Effegies

A number of the tombs and sculptured effigies are in such unfortunate plight as to afford no satisfactory assurance of their identification. This is especially unfortunate in the case of the effigy known as that of Giraldus Cambrensis, where the features are now entirely obliterated and no recognizable detail remains of the famous archdeacon..

Education

St David's free grammar school 1811 Fenton

The western cloister was formerly occupied by a free school and library, prior to it being removed to the room where now the audit is held, from which it was again banished to the chapter house. In the north aisle facing the door by which you enter it there is a considerable flight of steps, by which you ascend to what was formerly the chapter house, but now converted into the free school.

There is yet to be spoken of an ancient building on the south side of the cemetery, originally intended as a store room to hold materials for the Church, and the vault or basement has been always so appropriated, but the upper story, after the destruction of the school and library over the west cloister was fitted to to supply its place and continued to do so for two centuries till it was converted into a chapter house and audit room by the late Mr Archdeacon Holcombe, from an ill directed zeal for innovation, remaining a sad monument of his total want of taste in Architecture. There was then a sort of charm about it to prevent the disgust it now excites. In this respectable character I was accustomed to remember it , and to associate with it a thousand other pleasing recollections of the scenes of my boyish days, and the companions of my mature years . [Fenton was a scholar there under Mr David Rogers]

1863 Scott

The ancient Chapter House has long been converted into a boys' school, and has been reduced to the condition which such a use would lead one to expect. Instead of being approached, as formerly, by a winding staircase from the Church, it is now entered by a hideous flight of external steps, which block-up the Aisle windows, and it has a modern door-way cut through the wall. The ancient floor over the Chapter House has been destroyed ; the roof (itself modern) is ready to fall in; the windows have been deprived of their tracery ; the parapets, pinnacles, &c., are in a state of absolute ruin ; indeed, the whole building may be almost correctly described in the same terms. Happily, enough remains, in all probability, for the recovery of the entire design, though a single winter may seriously reduce the amount of evidence. It is almost superfluous to say that the entire building must be put into a perfect state of repair, and brought back in every respect to its original form.

First mentioned as a room built over Cathedral workshop in 1565; 1791 converted by John Nash into the Chapter house. Demolished 1829.

Benevolent School

This school was held in a long low room, over some cottages. The desks and benches were fixed according to the British and Foreign system, and in tolerably good condition. It was lighted by two windows and two skylights, all in a bad state of repair. The school was supported by the Dean and Chapter and a few local subscribers, the deficiency in the master's £36 being made up by the Curate, the Rev H Richardson. The master appeared a superior man for a country schoolmaster – David Lewis Assistant.

Bethania Day School or Beynon's Charity.

The present master is Thomas Davies who previously was deputy. He was a mere labourer who had broken his thigh sixteen years before . The school is held at present in the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel. Instead of 36s per annum from the charity , he receives only 24s.

Ebenezer Day School

I visited this school on the 20th January. It is connected with the Ebenezer congregation and managed by a committee consisting, at the time of my visit of 32 members, the qualification being a payment of 1s a quarter. It is conducted on the principles of the British system as regards religion. The room was furnished with a desk along one side, benches across the middle and benches down the other side. Near the fireplace was a small table for the master. The room was ill ventilated. There were pegs for the hats at the door, and some lesson cards on the walls, but no maps. Maps were said to be coming. No regular school registers were kept. The children were even more than usual shy and sheepish. They sang several pieces of part music nicely. The songs were of a much more rational kind than those which are generally heard in schools for the poor.

I heard nine Read with ease from the seventh chapter of St Mark. --The fifth commandment bids us honour father and mother is in Exodus -did not know the chapter it is one of the ten commandments. Had some knowledge of geography and arithmetic.

Tabernacle School

I visited this school, which was not in operation owing to the Christmas holidays, and had just changed its master, on the 20th January. The new master appeared to be an intelligent man. The school room is commodious and well furnished on the British system. The administration of this school appears to resemble that of the school at Ebenezer Chapel. The room which is in a wing of the Chapel was raised at a cost of £150 advanced by friends to the undertaking. This debt is now in course of liquidation by means of the Sunday school collections being made at Tabernacle; the Sunday school expenses not being large enough to absorb all that is collected. Incidental expenses are met by the Committee. It is in expectation that the subscriptions will improve. The poor are educated gratuitously. The pay scholars pay in advance. It is found that the dread of losing a privilege in the one case, and a desire to take out their money's worth in the other make the parents diligent in sending their children to school.

There were no class registers at the time of my visit; nor was the admission book of the late master left in such a state as to be very intelligible to his successor or myself.

Miss Appleby's School

This school was also closed for the holidays. I saw the mistress in the country. She seemed a superior person. Her pupils had at one time amounted to 45 but the opening of three free schools in the parish had reduced her numbers to their present amount. She said that the competition of so many teachers rendered pupils more difficult to manage than formerly, because on dismissal from one school they were sure of reception at another. She thought that the Welsh language was more directly cultivated than it used to be. As her own school had been diminished in numbers, so many other dame schools had been extinguished altogether by the new schools established.

Tabernacle Sunday Schoolroom

On the 10th of January I visited the above school. I went to different classes and found that most of them could Read the Scriptures with tolerable ease; the children reading even better than the adults. No other system of questioning adopted than that of putting the verse verbatim into an interrogatory form. Two or three boys in a class of children that I questioned gave me very good answers respecting the history of our Saviour David Lewis Assistant.

Bishops And Clerks--- RCAHMW

The Bishops and Clerks consist of seven islands, the largest of which are Carreg Rhossan and Bishop's Rock. The islands were notoriously dangerous to sailors approaching Milford Haven from the south-west. Eggs from the islands were reportedly taken, some for eating and some for sending to Bristol to be used for fining Wines. Sheep were fed on three of the islands. It was noted that a former tenant of Ramsey Island used to voyage to Carreg Rhosson every summer, in order to take several dozen puffins and obtain the feathers from their soft plumage. Guy Bishop of St David's----- Boniface IX Pope 1402. Guy Bishop of St David's etc. to William Rowe and Margaret Hylton, etc.

We have received Letters of the venerable father in Christ Francis, by divine compassion cardinal priest with the title of St. Susannah penancer general of our Lord the pope, presented on your behalf, containing this series of words

To the venerable etc. the Bishop of St Davids or his vicar in spiritualities Francis etc. (as above), greeting etc.

On behalf of William Rowe and Margaret Hilton, a wedded couple of your diocese, a petition has been offered to us containing that some time ago they not being aware of any impediment existing at the present time according to the custom of the country, and consummated this by connection of the flesh and begat offspring. But afterwards it came to the knowledge of this couple that they are united with each other within the fourth degree of consanguinity. And verily since if there were to be a divorce made between them grave scandals in all probability would result there from, the same wedded persons have caused humble supplication to be made for provision to be mercifully made for them upon these points by the apostolic see. We therefore desiring provision to be made for the saving of their souls and for the avoiding of such scandals, by authority of the Lord Pope, the care of whose penitentiary we bear, and by his special mandate hereon made to us by the oracle of the living voice, commit it to your circumspection that if it be so, if the said woman have not for this cause been ravished from any one, to deal with these married people that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity be legitimate.

Dated at Rome at St. Peter, 29 April, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of Lord Boniface IX the Pope.

We mercifully grant you a dispensation according to the form and effect of the before written

Letters, by the authority committed to us in this behalf, in order that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity you may lawfully remain in your marriage at another time in fact contracted between you, decreeing the offspring begotten and to be begotten of the marriage itself to be legitimate.

In witness whereof etc. Dated in our manor of Lantefey, 21 September 1402, etc.

Chichely Henry 1408 – Some records of this time refer to John Hoit as Bishop - he was actually Precentor and died in 1413 Chichely was actually consecrated by the Pope at Sienna in 1408 and he was translated to Canterbury in 1414.

On 30 July 1486 at Lamphey a letter, the tenour of which follows, was exhibited to H. Bishop of St Davids. --To the venerable father in Christ etc. the Bishop St David's or his vicar general in spiritualities. Julian by the mercy of the Lord Bishop of Ostia sendeth greeting and sincere charity in the Lord. A petition offered unto us on behalf of Walter ap John of Stacorse layman of your diocese contained that by the instigation of the devil he lately killed one Walter Roger, priest of the said place, his Spiritual father who had baptized one of his sons, on which account he falls under the sentence of excommunication pronounced in general terms against such as do these things, upon which things he has caused supplication to be humbly made, setting forth the same, for a due remedy to be mercifully provided for him by the apostolic see. We therefore by authority of the Lord Pope the care of whose penitentiary we bear and by his special mandate upon this made to us by the oracle of the living voice commit to your prudence that if this is so when he shall have gone by all the larger churches of that place where so great a crime was perpetrated, naked and unshod with only his breeches on, bearing a rod in his hand, and a yoke about his neck if he can with safety and caused himself to be beaten before the doors of the churches aforesaid and with the priests of the same singing a penitential psalm, when the multitude of the people in these is greatest, publicly confessing his sin, and when he shall have adequately satisfied, if he have not already done so, the Church which the murdered priest served, and when he and his heirs have been deprived for ever of any fee or right of patronage he hold of the Church (and lest the memory of the punishment be too short let his children on this account be deemed incapable of holding an ecclesiastical benefice unless with them there be a merciful dispensation upon this by the apostolic see, you shall absolve this layman from the said sentence and such guilt and excess of priesticide in the accustomed form of the Church and enjoin on him therefore by the authority aforesaid, such penance as may be to him for salvation and to others for terror.

Dated at Rome at St. Peter under the seal of the office of the penitentiary 21 April, 4 Innocent VIII The Episcopal Register of St Davids 1397 – 1518.

ap Morgan Traharn 1491, 27 October. On the 27th day of October in the Chapel in the manor of Lamphey Sir Leonyll Griffin was admitted by the aforesaid Lord to be another of the chaplains of the said chantry of Wogan Sir John Knight, founded in the cathedral Church of St David's on the presentation of Traharn ap Morgan and Done Joneta his wife of the parish of Burton (her sister Done Joan wife of ap Philip de Picton Thomas was co-patroness of the other chaplain). have given and by this our present writing confirmed to our beloved in Christ Matteston Henry the office of Parker or keeper of the park of Lamphey and have made, ordained, and appointed, the said Henry Parker or keeper of the same park during his life, to have, occupy and exercise the said office by himself or his sufficient deputy during his life as other Parkers and keepers have been accustomed to do in the aforesaid office, taking thereto yearly from us and our successors bishops of the bishopric of St. David's for doing and exercising the aforesaid office 72s. of lawful money of England by the hands of the reeve of Lamphey for the time being, together with all the fees, commodities, and rewards, belonging or pertaining to the same office, at two terms of the year, namely at the feasts of Easter and St. Michael the Archangel, by equal portions. And if it happen that the aforesaid 72s be in arrear unpaid, in part or in the whole, at any feast named above, that then it shallwell be lawful for the aforesaid Henry to distrain in all the messuages, lands, and tenements which we have in the lordship of Lamphey and carry away the distrains so taken and retain them until the aforesaid Henry during his life be satisfied in full of the aforesaid 72s together with all arrears thereof.

ap Owen Lewis 1486 10 November Acts before the Rev. father Hugh aforesaid in his manor of Lantfey of the diocese of St Davids had and begun on 10 November in the year as above and continued day by day in a Pembroke cause of an error or heretical pravity against one Burley Sir Roger of Ireland then present For which Sir Roger indeed the same Rev. father - because Sir Roger himself as the said father asserted on the relation of faithfulmen had been and is notoriously and in manifold ways defamed with him and evidently and on probable conjectures suspected of and upon divers errors, opinions, and articles savoring of heresy met expressly contrary to the determination of holy mother Church by himself Sir Roger held and publicly spoken and preached, as was said - peremptorily fixed, appointed, and assigned a day on Saturday next after the feast of the Conception of the blessed Virgin Mary next then following namely 9 December then next, to appear before the same Rev. father in the Chapel of the blessed Virgin Mary situated within the said manor of Lantfey to answer upon such errors, opinions, and articles, as is aforesaid, then to be objected against him to the mere correction of his soul, of the mere office of the said Rev. father and also on information, and further to do and receive in that behalf what shallbe just, there being then present there Master Gely Richard Canon of Abergwilly College, and William, prior of Pill, with other discreet men besides who were there. When indeed the Saturday abovesaid was come, the same Sir Roger the Irishman appeared for trial in person in Chapel aforesaid before the said Rev. father then sitting in judgment for a tribunal and thereupon the same Sir Roger when required made oath on the most holy gospels to the said Rev. father in regard to speaking the truth and answering Faithfully upon all points then to be objected against him and enquired of from him concerning and savouring of the matter of errors or heresy. Against this Sir Roger the Irishman indeed, so sworn, for the mere correction of his soul the same Rev. father of his office objected and articulated the articles underwritten. Which articles indeed follower and are these

First of all that the same Sir Roger in presence of one Master ap Ris John in the house of Nicholas White of Pembroke there being then present there the said White Nicholas and his wife White Katharine by name Tyler Thomas of Tenby and Baret John with some others then present, publicly arguing with the said Master John said that he would and could make the Lord's body in the time of the mass for those present and for himself those bones would be Bread alone. Also that contrariwise he would at his pleasure sometimes make it as far as related to himself and not to those present Which articles indeed, together with other errors besides obstinately adhered to there in the presence of thoseafore written, he then confessed that he had said, which errors, truly, together with all errors against the Faith and definition of the Holy Roman Church, in writing, before the Rev. father aforesaid and his commissary there namely Master Lewis ap Owen, doctor of decrees and archdeacon of Cardigan, with all the others then called to this, he publicly abjured in form following -

In the name of God, Amen!

I, Sir Roger, chaplain, now of the diocese of St David's before you Hugh etc. Thomas heresies and errors which of late before Master John ap Res and others then present I obstinately asserted and cherished in the house of Nicholas White at Pembroke etc. I verily abjure and the said erroneous articles and all other articles whatsoever, erroneous and contrary to the holy Faith, and all heresies, here in these writings and expressly, I humbly and devoutly renounce, supplicating the Rev. fatherhood to deign to impart unto me the benefit of absolution from every sentence of excommunication passed by the holy fathers against such wanderers, subjecting me to every correction and reformation whatsoever adequate to and of right required on account of the premises. And him the said Rev. father absolved in due form of law and enjoined on him a fitting penance in that behalf which he Faithfully fulfilled publicly in the Church of St. Mary , Pembroke. The Episcopal Register of St Davids 1397 - 1518

Barlow William died about 1569 brother of Roger and Thomas , --first came to Pembrokeshire as Prior of Haverfordwest Priory then , was a Canon regular and prior of Bisham.

He was constituted Bishop of St. Asaph, and two months afterward translated to St David's. He was very keen to get the Diocese transferred from St David's to Carmarthen. In 1538 Bishop Barlow of St David's, unroofed the Palace at St David's, (some say he sold the lead to get portions for his five daughters, who all married bishops). He also unroofed LLawhaden. In 1540 Henry VIII. rented Lamphey Palace from Bishop Barlow of St David's, and gave it to Devereux Richard, eldest son of Earl Ferrers, afterwards Earl of Essex. In the 2nd Edward VI. (1547) Bishop Barlow was translated to Bath and Wells but in the 1st of May 1553 he was deprived and forced to fly the realm, and remained in exile until the accession of Elizabeth, when he was appointed Bishop of Chichester, and was the principal Bishop of the four at the consecration of Archbishop Parker. Bishop Barlow, the first Protestant Bishop in England died in 1569, and was interred in his own cathedral of Chichester. He married Wellesbourne, Agatha a runaway Abbess of Norfolk, daughter of Wellesborne, John esq..

Bishop William Barlow and his wife Agatha Wellesbourne had five daughters, who all became the wives of bishops, namely,

Barlow Anne Married first, Bradbridge Augustus then Westfaling, Herbert Bishop of Hereford.

Barlow Elizabeth went as a companion with the Countess of Oxford into Scotland, and was maid of honour to Mary Queen of Scots. and was mother of the succeeding Lords Elphinstone and Drummond. Married first, Alexander, Lord Elphinstone when she was only 13 or 14 second Lord Drummond she died before 1622

Barlow Margaret Married Overton William, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry.

Barlow Frances Married Parker Matthew, son of Archbishop Parker, then Matthews Tobias, Archbishop of York. Toby Matthews, Archbishop of York, was a great favourite of Queen Elizabeth and King James I., Barlow Antonina Married Wickham W., Bishop of Lincoln.

Barlowe William 1560 was the son of Dr. William Barlowe Bishop of St David's and was born in Pembrokeshire. He was entered at Baliol College Oxford, about, and four years afterwards he took a degree in arts. Having left Oxford, he travelled much abroad, and became skilled in the art of Navigation. About 1573, he was admitted into holy orders, and obtained several preferments. He was a prebendary of Winchester, and rector of Easton, near that city. In 1588, he was made a prebendary of Lichfield, but in the following year he resigned the prebend for the treasurership of the same cathedral. He afterwards became chaplain to Prince Henry, and at length in 1614, he was appointed archdeacon of Salisbury. He is memorable for being the first who wrote upon the nature and Properties of the loadstone, and he was eminent for his industry in searching, and happiness in finding out many magnetical secrets. He was the first who made the inclinatory instrument transparent, and to be used pendant with a glass on both sides, and a ring at the top. He likewise suspended it in a compass box, where with two ounces weight it was made fit for use at sea. He was likewise the first who found out the difference between iron and Steel, and their tempers for magnetical purposes. He also first showed the right way of touching magnetical needles, and was the first that invented the piecing and cementing of loadstones. Finally he was the first that showed the reasons, why a loadstone being double-capped must take up so great a weight. On these subjects he wrote 1. "The Navigator's Supply, containing many things of principal importance belonging to navigation with divers instruments framed chiefly for that purpose," 4to. London, 1597. 2. "Magnetical

Boniface	IX Pope	1402	Guy Bishop of St David's etc. to Rowe William and Hylton Margaret , etc.

We have received Letters of the venerable father in Christ Francis, by divine compassion cardinal priest with the title of St. Susannah penancer general of our Lord the pope, presented on your behalf, containing this series of words.

To the venerable etc. the Bishop of St Davids or his vicar in spiritualities Francis etc. (as above), greeting etc.

On behalf of William Rowe and Margaret Hilton, a wedded couple of your diocese, a petition has been offered to us containing that some time ago they not being aware of any impediment existing at the present time according to the custom of the country, and consummated this by connection of the flesh and begat offspring. But afterwards it came to the knowledge of this couple that they are united with each other within the fourth degree of consanguinity. And verily since if there were to be a divorce made between them grave scandals in all probability would result there from, the same wedded persons have caused humble supplication to be made for provision to be mercifully made for them upon these points by the apostolic see. We therefore desiring provision to be made for the saving of their souls and for the avoiding of such scandals, by authority of the Lord Pope, the care of whose penitentiary we bear, and by his special man hereon made to us by the oracle of the living voice, commit it to your circumspection that if it be so, if the said woman have not for this cause been ravished from any one, to deal with these married people that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity be legitimate. dated at Rome at St. Peter, 29 April, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of Lord Boniface IX the Pope.

We mercifully grant you a dispensation according to the form and effect of the before written Letters, by the authority committed to us in this behalf, in order that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity you may lawfully remain in your marriage at another time in fact contracted between you, decreeing the offspring begotten and to be begotten of the marriage itself to be legitimate.

In witness whereof etc. dated in our manor of Lantefey, 21 September 1402, etc

The Mayor, Justice, Common Council, burgesses and inhabitants of the borough and Parish of St Mary , Tenby, to Charles Moss, Bishop of St Davids (Thomas Williams was Mayor in 1770-1 and 1772-3)

Petition

Humbly sheweth unto your lordship that we have lived in a very unhappy state in regard to our religious worship since our present rector has come here, whose vociferous method of preaching is truly disagreeable to us And though we have made frequent applications to him to preach by notes as his worthy predecessor always did, and all other Clergymen of the Church of England still do, yet he obstinately persists in following his methodistical custom of preaching extempore, and that so harsh and unintelligible to all capacities as he has prevented many well disposed Christians from frequenting the Church.

This obstinate behaviour of our rector being truly grievous to your petitioners, they, by their ChurchWarden presented him in your lordship's court at Haverfordwest at your Lordship's last visitation, and also at two subsequent courts In order to prevent your petitioners from having justice done then our rector has for these two years last past elected one Thomas Howells a man of a despicable character to be his ChurchWarden who acts agreeable to the rector's desire and has in his presentment contradicted your petitioners ChurchWarden's presentment. As your petitioners have hitherto had no redress, we humbly apprehend we have no other method of being relieved but by applying to your lordship by petition

Your petitioners humble hope that your lordship will take their unhappy case into consideration unhappy, we may truly say, as we cannot go to our own Church with any comfort to hear his thundering incoherent doctrine, and grant us such relief as to your lordship shall see fit . Hylton Margaret 1402 Guy Bishop of St David's etc to William Rowe and Margaret Hylton, etc We have received Letters of the venerable father in Christ Francis, by divine compassion cardinal priest with the title of St Susannah penancer general of our Lord the pope, presented on your behalf, containing this series of words

To the venerable etc the Bishop of St Davids or his vicar in spiritualities Francis etc as above, greeting etcn

On behalf of William Rowe and Margaret Hilton, a wedded couple of your diocese, a petition has been offered to us containing that some time ago they not being aware of any impediment existing at the present time according to the custom of the country, and consummated this by connection of the flesh and begat offspring But afterwards it came to the knowledge of this couple that they are united with each other within the fourth degree of consanguinity And verily since if there were to be a divorce made between them grave scandals in all probability would result there from, the same wedded persons have caused humble supplication to be made for provision to be mercifully made for them upon these points by the apostolic see We therefore desiring provision to be made for the saving of their souls and for the avoiding of such scandals, by authority of the Lord Pope, the care of whose penitentiary we bear, and by his special man hereon made to us by the oracle of the living voice, commit it to your circumspection that if it be so, if the said woman have not for this cause been ravished from any one, to deal with these married people that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity be legitimate

dated at Rome at St Peter, 29 April, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of Lord Boniface IX the pope We mercifully grant you a dispensation according to the form and effect of the before written Letters, by the authority committed to us in this behalf, in order that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity you may lawfully remain in your marriage at another time in fact contracted between you, decreeing the offspring begotten and to be begotten of the marriage itself to be legitimate. In witness whereof etc d in our manor of Lantefey, 21 September 1402, etc

Pritchett Delabere	1714-1801 a Clergyman, was born at Narberth, Pembrokeshire , where his father practised many years as a physician. Being invited by Precentor Hill to settle at St David's , Mr. Pritchett was appointed master of the Free School, and successively vicar-choral and sub-chanter. He was soon afterwards collated to the small vicarage of Carew in his native county, this being his only preferment. Moved with compassion at the wretched state of the poor of the very extensive parish of St David's who were sixteen miles away from the nearest doctor, he applied himself to the study of medicine and surgery, which he afterwards practised with great success and without making any charge. By reason of his integrity and fidelity as a Clergyman, his ability as a medical practitioner, and his general beneficence, he was held in the highest esteem. Gent. Mag., 1801, pt. 2, p. 1214. Rowe William	1402 . Guy Bishop of St David's etc. to

William Rowe and Margaret Hylton, etc.

We have received Letters of the venerable father in Christ Francis, by divine compassion cardinal priest with the title of St. Susannah penancer general of our Lord the pope, presented on your behalf, containing this series of words

To the venerable etc. the Bishop of St Davids or his vicar in spiritualities Francis etc. as above , greeting etc. On behalf of William Rowe and Margaret Hilton, a wedded couple of your diocese, a petition has been offered to us containing that some time ago they not being aware of any impediment existing at the present time according to the custom of the country, and consummated this by connection of the flesh and begat offspring. But afterwards it came to the knowledge of this couple that they are united with each other within the fourth degree of consanguinity. And verily since if there were to be a divorce made between them grave scandals in all probability would result there from, the same wedded persons have caused humble supplication to be made for provision to be mercifully made for them upon these points by the apostolic see. We therefore desiring provision to be made for the saving of their souls and for the avoiding of such scandals, by authority of the Lord pope, the care of whose penitentiary we bear, and by his special manhereon made to us by the oracle of the living voice, commit it to your circumspection that if it be so, if the said woman have not for this cause been ravished from any one, to deal with these married people that not withstanding the impediment of such consanguinity be legitimate.

Dated at Rome at St. Peter, 29 April, in the eleventh year of the pontificate of Lord Boniface IX the Pope.

We mercifully grant you a dispensation according to the form and effect of the before written

Letters, by the authority committed to us in this behalf, in order that notwithstanding the impediment of such consanguinity you may lawfully remain in your marriage at another time in fact contracted between you, decreeing the offspring begotten and to be begotten of the marriage itself to be legitimate.

In witness whereof etc. Dated in our manor of Lantefey, 21 September 1402, etc.

Extinct Chapels RCAM

At the opening of the 17th century there existed within the limits of the parish of St Davids, and in easy reach of the cathedral Church (which was also the church of the parish), indisputable traces of three small ecclesiastical structures of the nature of subordinate Chapels to the cathedral Church. There was clear recollection of several others which had been deserted prior to the definite breach with the Roman Church in 1543, or were despoiled and ruined in the consequence of the change in religious policy that then took place. Browne Willis in his Survey of the Cathedral Church of St David (1716) copying from a memorandum of George Owen (d 1613) who possessed an intimate and life long acquaintance with the district, states (P 52) that “there were formerly several Chapels about St Davids which all belonged to the mother Church, dedicated to several saints, and were commodiously seated to draw the devotions of pilgrims”. He expressly names the Chapel of St Non(or Nun), the Chapel of St Justinian, and Capel Patrick; and of these there were considerable remains at the opening of the 17th century which continue visible today. But of Capel Patrick, the site is known only from the mounds of earth beneath which are buried the foundations and debris of the small building.

There were also Capel y Pistyll and Capel Gwrhyd, both of which had been deserted and may have more or less disappeared when George Owen wrote his memorandum on the small ecclesiastical foundations which had been attached to the cathedral Church. In addition to the above there is good evidence for the former existence of Capel Cwmwdig and Capel yr hen fynwent “ the Chapel of the old burial ground”

St Nons Chapel & Holy Well

Only the lower parts of this plain rectangular Chapel now remain.

This must be one of the most idyllically situated monuments in Pembrokeshire, overlooking, as it does, the rocky coastline above St. Non Bay on the Pembrokeshire Coastal Path. The ruins lack any distinguishing features to help date the building, and the earliest reference to a Chapel here is in a document of 1335. However, an early excavation reports the uncovering of stone coffins which might in fact have been slab-lined graves of the early Christian period. Also the presence here of the pillar-stone with its incised Latin cross, roughly datable to the 7th to 9th century, is suggestive of an early medieval foundation for the Chapel, although unfortunately, there is no firm evidence that the stone originally came from the site.

One legend is that St Non was seeking shelter as she was about to give birth and found a prehistoric Kistvan of three upright stones and a large covering stone giving shelter from the storm. It is there in that ancient shelter that St David was born and the Chapel later built on the holy place.

The Chapel is a simple rectangular building, with an entrance of the west. The north-south orientation of the building is unusual, and is probably best explained by the foundations having been laid out to suit the severe slope. The massive masonry on the southern, downhill end was presumably put down as part of a foundation platform, to help level the site. The position of the altar is marked by a step at the north end. The Chapel is traditionally held to Mark the place where St Non gave birth to St David.

The Chapel was one of the more important sea-shore Chapels in the area; two pilgrimages to St David's were held in the medieval period to equal one to Rome, and pilgrims to the Chapel gave money which was taken to the cathedral. After the Reformation, pilgrims came to St David's in fewer numbers, and St Nons Chapel passed out of religious use. It was converted into a dwelling house, and later into a vegetable garden.

The Holy well, just to the east of the Chapel, continued to be a famous place for healing even after the Reformation, and there are antiquarian references to the pious offering pins and pebbles at the well on 2 March, St Nons Day. In the 18th century, the present stone vault was built over it, though this may have replaced an earlier well building.

The Chapel of St Non

The first mention of this Chapel is made by George Owen in Browne Willis's Survey – This is as follows

'The first and principle of these is St Nun's Chapel, so called from St Nun, who is said to have been St David's mother. There is a fine well besides it covered with a stone roof and enclosed within a wall and benches to sit upon round the wall. Some old simple people so still to visit this saint at some particular times especially upon St Nun's day (March 2nd) which they keep holy and offer pins, pebbles etc at this well. The next day they keep also for Lily Gwas Dewy (Lily, St David's Man????) . This Chapel lies south of St Davids within a quarter of a mile of the seaside.(Added by Willis; The ground on which the Chapel stood is now turned into a garden of leeks)

Further particulars of this interesting structure are given in the West Wales Historical Society

Transactions:-

This Chapel was dedicated to St Non, the mother of St David. The date of its foundation is unknown, but it must have been prior to 1335, as in a grant of a close of land made by Bishop Henry Gower in that year to the sub-chanter and vicars choral, one of the boundaries of the land in question was stated to be the road leading from the city of St Davids to the Chapel of the blessed Non (Stat Menev p111) The site of the old Chapel, which is a field on the south of the city overlooking St Brides Bay, is marked by four ruined walls, a few of the lower courses of which undoubtedly comprise masonry of the ancient structure.... It seems probable that St Non's Chapel was abandoned as a Chapel before 1557. We find that while the valuation of the sea coast Chapels was returned as £11 in the Valor Eccl[1535] in the Chapter Accounts for 1557-8 and 1565-6 it is 5s per annum which suggests that the Chapel had been converted into a dwelling house. There is still on the site of the old Chapel a stone on which is inscribed a cross in a circle. In 1898 the Rev S Baring Gould devoted three days to the examination of this Chapel, a short account of which he gives in Arch Camb 1898 p345.

“The walls of the Chapel are of two if not three periods. At The south end there is very early and rude work at the base, to a height of 7ft 6in at the south west corner. This is set in earth. Above this , clearly distinguished from it, is medieval walling of flat stones (mostly) laid in strong mortar. The earlier work shows internally as well as externally..... The north wall of medieval building, so is that to the west, with the exception of a small portion or the base at the south west extremity. In the east face of the building is set an early cross not in place, which is figured in Westwoods Lapid. walliae. The north wall ends raggedly to the east, projecting beyond the present east wall, with which it is not tied, and from which it differs nothing in character. This east wall has been thrown down at some unknown date, from the remains of a window at the south end; at that end the medieval wall has been built on the earlier foundation wall so as to form an exact right angle, whereas in the earlier building the angle was incorrect, resulting in the building being 4ft narrower at the west than at the south end.... The medieval builders intended to widen the Chapel to the north or altar end by 4ft; whether they ever completed this reconstruction it is difficult to determine. The base of the present wall is not so cyclopean in character as the south wall, and there is an apparent break 13ft from the south east angle; but the present east wall undoubtedly remains on the line of the earliest wall for it continues that of the portion of the wall on which the later builders set their wall askew. At the north east corner there are no traces of a turn or angle in the wall that projects, as though it had never been finished off The altar step platform at the northwest is of flat stones laid in mortar. About 3ft 6in from the west it is broken away where the altar stood, and here some fragments of flooring tile without ornament [now in the Tenby Museum] were found.

The Cross inscribed Stone

The cross is formed of equal sized arms enclosed in a plain circle 1ft 2in in diameter. The lower limb is prolonged to 1ft 10in

Brass

About the year 1851 a small brass representing the half length figure of a priest in ecclesiastical vestments with gloved hands lifted on his breast in prayer was found in the ruins of St Nons Chapel. Up to about the year 1859 it was preserved in the house of the archdeacon of Brecon . It is said to have been sold at St Davids among the effects of Richard Davies (died 14th May 1859), archdeacon of Brecon. A rubbing was made of the brass and from it a few copies were printed, of which the only one that is known to have survived is in the museum of the Carmarthen Antiquarian Society.

Stone Coffins According to Fenton p113 “In digging for earth within the ruined walls of the Chapel, stone coffins were found, and part of a curious image of rude Pottery glazed, being the head and shoulders of a male figure . It was hollow and filled with prodigious hard cement, and is now in the possession of Mr Archdeacon Davies.

St Nons Chapel ----- RCAHMW 2007

The western most headlands of Dewisland, facing across the Atlantic, comprise some of the most dramatic and long-settled stretches of coastline in Wales. Among the reminders of St Davids' immense importance as a place of religious pilgrimage in the Middle Ages are two ancient Chapels sited close to the cliffs' edges. To the south of St Davids city, overlooking Skomer Island and St Brides Bay, can be found St Non's Chapel, now represented by footings and a ruinous wall, but reputedly built on the site where St Non gave birth to St David. Just to the north-east is a covered holy well where water can still be taken. Though a significant place of pilgrimage in the medieval period, it fell into disuse after the Reformation and was used as a vegetable garden. Arguably it has regained a role as a place of pilgrimage, solitude and reflection for the many tourists who now travel the coastal path or make the short walk from St Davids.

The Chapel of St Justinian

The description of this small ruined Chapel by George Owen given in Browne Willis Survey of St

Davids is as follows :-

“Capel Stinan (St Justinians Chapel) lies next. This has been a very fine strong building; I know but few churches in Wales of a better kind of building, with battlements round it and a tower at one end in which there were bells formerly. The walls are still very strong, tho there has been no covering upon it these many years. There is a well by this Chapel. It is something above a mile west of St Davids

The account of the Chapel in the transactions of the West Wales Historical Society adds the following particulars:-

St Justinians Chapel lies in a field close to the lifeboat station at the little harbour of Porth Stinan, exactly two miles from St Davids. The main walls of the Chapel are still standing The erection of this Chapel is attributed to Bishop Vaughan, who presided over the see from 1509 to 1522. It is evident, however that Bishop Vaughans edifice must have replaced an older structure, as in the chapter accounts of William Warryn for 1492 there is an entry recording the receipt of £10 from the Chapels of St Justinian, St Non, and Gwrhyd.

The ruins as described by Jones and Freeman show the Chapel to have been a building 47ft by 20ft, with three doors, two on the north side away from the sea, and one at the east end; three windows – small apertures on each side of the nave and one at the east end; a rough corbel table running round the whole building, but cut into by the arch of the east window The western battlemented tower was probably not of great height. A step ran across the Chapel, dividing it into two equal portions; on either side above the step is a hole in the wall which probably received the rood beam. There are traces of a piscina and an aumbry. The shell of the little Church still stands, a silent witness to the excellence of the building spoken of by George Owen.

StJustinians Chapel--- RCAHMW 2007

To the west of St Davids, overlooking Ramsey Sound and the St Davids Lifeboat Station, are the substantial remains of StJustinians Chapel. Like the smaller St Non's Chapel, this was a place of pilgrimage for medieval travellers to St Davids and gathered donations which were passed to the cathedral. Like its smaller cousin, the present stone building may obscure an earlier structure many centuries older, possibly dating to the early Christian period. Siân Rees notes that the dedication to St Stinan, a little known Celtic saint, may indicate a pre-Norman establishment.

The remaining structure is largely sixteenth century and the building is now roofless but otherwise substantially intact. The rubble stone walls form a rectangular plan measuring 12m x 5m and there are three windows in each side, two doors in the north wall, and segment headed arcading. Traces of a piscina and an aumbry recess are visible in the chancel. Excavation revealed the remains of an earlier building, possibly twelfth century, and several, possibly more ancient burials. StJustinians Well lies about 40m to the south-east.

The Chapel of St Patrick

On the shore of Whitesand Bay, about 1 ½ miles north west of the cathedral, the foundations of a small rectangular building may be traced on a field still called Parc y capel. The site is that of the Chapel of St Patrick, of which George Owen observes

Not far off is Capel Patrick full west of St Davids, and placed as near his country, viz, Ireland, as it could well be. It is now wholly decayed. All these Chapels are near the seaside, and adjoining to the places where those who came by sea commonly landed. They were placed here to draw the devotion of the sea men and passengers when they first came ashore; other pilgrims used likewise to come to them. What was there offered was carried to the Cathedral and divided every Saturday among the Canons and priests. Some yet living that belonged to the Church can remember since the offering money was brought on Saturday to the chapter house and there divided by dishfuls, the quantity not allowing them leisure to tell it.

The building appears to have measured about 30ft by 12 ft internally, and was orientated East South East. In the summer of 1924 the site became the subject of much popular interest occasioned by some well meant but not very scientifically conducted excavations. A place called St Patricks Seat was shown in the middle ages as the spot whence the Saint beheld the vision the whole island of which he was to be the apostle. -- visited 7th October 1921.

Whitesands Bay lies under a slight mound with an inscribed stone which reads:

'Underneath lies a Chapel dedicated to St Patrick built 6th-10th c. Excavated 1924'.

It is thought that the Chapel excavated was a post (Norman)-conquest building, referred to in a late 16th century document. It overlays an earlier cemetery, for which sections cut in 1970 suggested an early medieval date. J.Wiles 27.05.02

Cwmwdig Chapel and Parc y Fynwent

This was a well Chapel which drew its revenue from the offerings of its votaries; but there appears to be no record of its tutelary saint. No remains of the Chapel are left. There is little doubt however, that the site was either in the farmyard of Cwmwdig, or in a field lying between the farm house on the road leading from Llanrhian to St Davids.

The well, which is in the farmyard of Cwmwdig, is now surrounded by the walls and roofed with flagstones, and on either side of the entrance to the spring is a low stone seat, and above the right hand seat are two small niches, probably for offerings.

One of the fields of Cwmwdig Farm is still called Parc y Fynwent. It shows no traces of buildings.-- visited 31st May 1921

Whitewell Chapel and Well

About a quarter of a mile south of the Cathedral. In Fentons day faint traces were visible of a "handsome building" whilst the well which gave its name to the Chapel retained its arched covering and "fragments of fine masonry" were scattered about. Nothing is now to be seen above the surface, and the spring has been diverted for domestic purposes.

Here Bishop Beck [1280-1293] founded a hospital called in the confirmation of Pope Eugenius, March 1444-5, the priory of Whytwell and the Chapel there, for sick and infirm Clergy and for hospitality towards others, endowing it with property valued in 1326 at £5. This was annexed by Bishop Houghton to his new College of St Mary and appears to have constituted its sole temporal endowment. The Bishop was fined £20 for appropriating it without royal licence, but the fine was afterwards remitted --visited 27th September 1921.

Hospitium

At Llandrudion, about 2 miles east of the cathedral on a site called Parc Croes Fenton states that there was founded “at a very early period of the Church of St Davids an hospitium, with a prebend annexed” The Pemb Arch Survey reports “ the remains of an old building containing some interesting features. In the north wall which is about 6ft thick there are three vaulted recesses about 6ft Long by 4ft deep, which may have been used as sleeping places. In addition, there are in the walls several cupboard like recesses. The original windows are apertures, about 1ft high, and from 3ft to 4ft wide, while one window in the western pine shows a rude attempt to form a lancet; they do not appear to have been glazed. Clay of “Clom” has been used in building instead of mortar. This building is said to have been the residence of Dr Jones, a donor of charities in the county” Most of the details described have disappeared but the lines of the early walling are easily traced. The site should be carefully cleared – visited 29th September 1921.

Ffos Y Mynach, St Davids; Monk's Dyke; Monks Dyke—Trackway--- RCAHMW

A bank and ditch, believed to be an early medieval or medieval embanked trackway or dyke, which cuts generally north-south across the St Davids, or Dewisland, peninsula. It runs from the southern coastline at a narrow inlet called Ogof y Ffos, between Caer Bwdy and Porth Rhaw, on St Brides Bay; thence north along minor lanes north-west of Vachelich, turning then west along a minor road to Rhyd y Cleifon (SM 770 256), where it Forded the Clegir brook, then north towards Llysgennydd where it crossed the upper Fishguard road, over Dowrog Common (where it is shown as an earthwork on 19th century County Series mapping), and thence north towards Llanferran. Its course then may have continued to the northern coast at Porth y Dwfr, or north-east over Penberry towards Porth y Rhaw. T. Driver, RCAHMW, 2nd December 2009

Bishop's Mill; Dewiston Mill; Lower Mill; Felin Isaf, St Davids--- RCAHMW

Felin Isaf is an early-to-late nineteenth century corn mill on a medieval mill site which was first recorded in 1326, belonging to the Bishop and cathedral of St Davids. Attached to it on the north-west side is the mill house. The two-storey mill itself is built of rubblestone, and the gables show evidence of the roof level having been raised. Inside there is a complete set of mill machinery which once drove two pairs of stones. The overshot waterwheel was acquired from Melin Caer-Bwdy in the 1940s, the dismantled parts having been carried by boat along the coast, but in 1980 when milling ceased, the wheel was again dismantled and transferred to Y Felin at St Dogmaels. A Mark inside the mill records the name I Roberts and the date 1810. W J Crompton, RCAHMW, 9 July 2014.

Croes Phillip, St Davids, Parchmarks Of Possible Township--- RCAHMW

Royal Commission aerial reconnaissance on 16th July 2013 and subsequently revealed extensive parchmarks in a pair of arable fields at Croes Phillip which appear to show a polygonal stone-built enclosure or boundary bank in the eastern field, associated with rectangular parched shapes, and a further group of three parched shapes in the western field. The 1st edition County Series mapping for the fields shows no relict features.

The enclosure in the eastern field appears to represent a stony bank or wall describing a polygonal field, at odds to the present field boundaries but contained within them. At the western edge of the field can be seen three or four square and rectangular parchmarks. Some 130m west in the second field, towards its western perimeter, are a detached group of three further rectangular parchmarks. The Archaeological interpretation of these unusual parchmarks would favour a settlement or township of rectangular long houses with stone-built foundations, associated with a boundary wall or field; perhaps a medieval settlement of buildings. However, given the unusual parching signature of the remains it may be that a more mundane military or agricultural origin would explain the Markings. T. Driver, RCAHMW, 2013.

Fort Penlan Arch Camb 1852

On the occasion of the visit made to St David's by some members of the Cambrian Archaeological Association, my attention was drawn to an earthen fortification, situated upon a Hill overhanging the valley of the Alan, at a distance of less than a half mile to the south west of the cathedral and which I learned is called Penlan Castle. Its being marked in the Ordinance map as a small square fort seemed to render it deserving of attention in connection with the, as yet, undetermined site of the Roman town or menapia. It stands exactly upon the top of a very steep slope descending into the swampy valley; and on approaching it from St David's, I found a square enclosure of about forty seven paces in extent along three of its sides; two of these being upon the top of the Hill, are rather strongly fortified with a rampart sloping towards both the inner and outer sides, but no very marked ditch. On the side next to the valley the rampart is much slighter, the steep slope into the valley forms a sufficient defence.

Upon proceeding across this square fort I observed that which has caused this communication to be made to Archaeologia Cambresis. Adjoining to that side there is a, but very strong and nearly circular, fort, of about thirty paces in diameter, formed by a lofty rampart and deep external ditch. Throughout its circumference, except the part defended by the slope of the Hill, which is very steep, and where no rampart can be traced; but the slope may probably have been artificially increased. One part of this round fort intrudes considerably by its curved form, into the above mentioned square enclosure, and thus the two present the singular fact of forts of totally different form attached to each other.

The question is now raised as to which of these camps is the older, for few will probably consider them as of equal antiquity. In answer, it may be remarked, that if the square were removed, the circular enclosure would remain perfect, but the destruction of the circle would leave the square camp open upon one of its sides. To the opinion that the circle is of older formation than its neighbour the square, and that the formers of the latter took advantage of the side of the circle to constitute one side of their enclosure, there are several objections.

First- If the builders of the square attached their defences to the circular fort, they would probably have made an opening from one into the other but none such exists.

Secondly – The circle overlooks the square, which is thus commanded by it.

Thirdly – If the circle is of more recent formation, its builders might well consider the existence of the square as of no consequence, for their ditch not being interfered with by it, the strength of their post is no way weakened by its presence.

ROMAN?

It will be generally conceded that the square fort is in all probability a work of the Romans, and the circular one of some Celtic chief; and if the Britains continued to form circular fortifications after the departure of the Romans, this may be the fort of the heathen chief recorded as having given so much trouble to the founder of St David's and the stronger circular entrenchment having been thrown up by him

Having this directed attention to this singular juxtaposition of the forms adopted by these two nations, I leave the question of their relative priority to be decided by those better qualified for its discussion than I can pretend to be.

Parc y Castell: Arch Camb 1852

This is a promontory bank and ditch on Port Clais Rd half a mile south west of St David's. It is not iron age fort as has been suggested but a ring work and Bailey probably built for an early Bishop.

Parc-Y-Castell; Bishops Castle, St Davids--- RCAHMW 2007

Parc-y-Castell is an embanked and ditched ringwork, with the remains of a rectangular outer Bailey.

It survives in a concealed position on the north slopes of the River Alun, just west of St Davids, between the city and Porthclais harbour. Its origins are unclear and there is no recorded history, although some historians consider it may have been built by the bishops around 1115 to protect the early cathedral precinct from attack.

The ringwork measures some 40m by 32m internally, resting on natural valley scarps above the Afon Alun to the south-east, with a probable scarp-edge entrance to the north-east, showing a possible building platform within. A rectangular enclosure, 45m by 40m, banked and ditched, adjoins on the north-east. Parc-y-Castell is possibly associated with a series of linear banks the southern-most of which runs up to its south-western outer ditch.

Linear Banks, Parc-Y-Castell--- RCAHMW

These earthworks, consisting of conjoined linear banks, are depicted on historic Ordnance Survey mapping, and appear to be associated with Parc-y-Castell. The northern-most linear bank begins in the north-west corner of a field adjacent to the northern side of the road. It runs south-east (parallel to the western field boundary) for some 110m, until it reaches the road. A conjoining bank follows the road's northern boundary, running east-north-east for some 93m. Another bank runs parallel to this, following the southern road boundary for the same approximate distance. After some 50m a conjoining bank leaves the southern road boundary to run south-south-east towards the western side of Parc-y-Castell. When the bank draws level with Parc-y-Castell it turns east-north-east, and runs some 23m, as far as the ditch of the enclosure.

St David's Head Camp.

On the wild headland known as St David's Head, the Octopiarum Promontarium of Ptolemy's geography, are a number of remains of which the one known as Clawdd y Milwyr, 'the Warriors Dyke' is probably one of the earliest in date.

The defences consist of a rampart and ditch 200ft in length, which cut off a broad promontory. The rampart is formed of dry walling, some of the stones being very large. It has a present height of some 5ft with a 12ft fall to a somewhat shallow ditch about 50ft in width. Beyond the ditch are two stone banks 2ft and 3ft in height. The rampart at two places in its northern section retains for some few yds its original stone facing; it appears to have much in common with the stone vallum of Carn Goch in Carmarthenshire. The entrance pierces the wall at about one third of the distance from its southern termination; it has a depth of 7 ½ ft where it passes through the wall. The enclosure is approached by a causeway of little over 12ft in width, lined on either side with large stones many of which are still in situ. The enclosed area is dotted over with hut circles and rock shelters. Immediately within the entrance on the south is a previously unnoticed stone circle. It is 21ft in diameter, and is composed of ten or twelve loose stones, some of which, having flat tops, would serve as seats; its probable entrance is 7ft wide and faces east. Various implements and objects, Pottery, glass beads, remains of iron articles, and wood charcoal that were discovered in the course of the exploration of the Head in 1891 are in the Tenby Museum. A much worn pounding stone found in one of the circles is in the museum of the Carmarthenshire Antiquarian Society - visited 7th October 1921.

Castell Coch

A promontory half an acre in area, between Porth Trewen on the south and Aber Dinas on the north. Immediately in front of the promontory, and separated from it by a narrow channel, through which the tide runs swiftly is Ynys Gwair. The landward defence is a rampart 200 feet long, the south west terminal of which has been carried away by erosion of the coast. The southern half of this bank rises 7ft above the level of the enclosure, and falls 7 to 8 ft to a ditch. Four ft below is a 12ft platform with a 2ft bank beyond and a fall of 3ft to the natural ground. "the inner rampart is joined to the outer bank by a face flanking the roadway to the entrance on the east, which is between it and a saucer shaped clove over some low cliffs, across the western side of which is the northern half of the main line. This is defended by a low bank about 2ft high" (Lieut Colonel Morgan) The entrance is about 10ft in width; it was protected by stone pillars, one of which still stands 2ft above the surface. The whole work is much disintegrated –visited 28th September 1921

Castell Clegir Voia

An earthwork of rudely rectangular shape perched on a prominent rocky Hill overhanging the farmstead of Clegir Voia, nearly one mile west of the city of St Davids. The main enclosure which follows the contour of the Hill has a length of some 280ft and a width of 100ft. On a slightly lower level to the north east are traces of what appears to be an annex, about 50ft in length. Linking up the many outcrops of rock in a wall of stone and earth faced with slabs of large stones, some of which are yet in situ. The present average height of the rampart is 4ft, dropping 9ft to a ditch 3ft deep. On the side facing the annex are slight traces of a shallow ditch. Apparently the only entrance was through the annex, and this has been destroyed; there are no traces of an entrance into the main work itself.

An exploration of Clegir Voia was made by the Rev S Baring Gould in the year 1902 (Arch Camb 1903) the results of which is said to have shown it to be of pre Roman origin, as against its traditional Romano British foundation. Various hearths were uncovered, the Pottery fragments were very rude and coarse, and consisted of the remains of four vessels, one of them ornamented with a single line round it. Numerous sling stones and a flint arrowhead were also found. All the finds are deposited in the Tenby Museum –visited 27th September 1921.

Castell

A fine work with a rectangular Bailey to the north east, situated about a quarter of a mile east of Clegir Voia and about 180ft above the right bank of the river Alun. The rampart, 100 ft in depth, is well preserved, and rises from the enclosed level to a height averaging 10ft to fall from 18ft to 20ft to a ditch 7ft wide with a counterscarp of 10ft. The entrance, 10ft wide is at the east end of the bank. The Bailey has a length of 120ft and a width of 90ft, with an entrance in the west angle where the enclosing bank meets the ditch of the mound. Its rampart varies in height from 5ft with a 6ft fall to the natural level at the north, and 3ft with a 4ft fall to the east, it has been partially levelled. Possibly there was on the west side of the enclosure another court of which slight traces are perceptible; the surrounding bank is not more than 1ft high with a length of 100yds and 30yds from the western counterscarp. It ends suddenly and has no ditch and may be of later date than the main work. Leland observes of this earthwork "The remayne tokens of Cairboias castel standing by Alen ryvert about a quarter of a myle lower than St David on the same ryvert". This was doubtless the early Castle of the bishops of St Davids before the erection of Lawhaden. Leland is in error in regarding it as Caer Voia which lies about 500yds to the west—visited 27th September 1921.

Caer Aber Pwll, Caerau--- RCAHMW

Caer Aber Pwll is the western-most of two adjacent promontory forts, which together comprise a Scheduled Ancient Monument. Both utilise the defensive potentials of the steep coastal cliffs, with Caer Aber Pwll being the larger and more heavily defended of the two. The second fort, Little Aber Pwll, is situated some 100m to the east, although this fort's complex of banks and ditches extend to within 20m of it in places.

Caer Aber Pwll contains at least one building platform and is enclosed by a complex of up to four banks and ditches thought to represent at least two periods of construction, of uncertain relation, extending over a roughly 172m front. The main, inturned, gateway can be made out on the far side of the earthworks. A second enclosure on the east, measuring about 48m by 34m, may be a fragment of an early enclosure, isolated by redevelopment, an annex, or a separate and later enclosure butting onto the primary work.

Caerfai Promontory Fort --- RCAHMW

consists of a crescent of three to four lines of banks and ditches, about 100m in length, having what appears to be a former entrance gap, about 30m across, on the east, blocked by two lesser banks, the whole set across the northern, landward approaches to a 45m wide neck of land that opens onto a roughly 100m east-west by 50m cliff-girt promontory; emplacements for circular structures have been reported but not confirmed in the interior and there is said to be a good natural, small-boat harbour to the south.

Porth Clais Entrenchment

On the headland to the east of Port Clais the 6in Ord sheet places the title “Intrenchments”. All that is now visible is a semi circular bank almost 150 ft long and about 2ft in height. On the exterior side is a very shallow ditch, which provided the material for the bank. The work is probably agricultural, and of no distant date. :-- visited 29th September 1921.

St David's Airfield, --- RCAHWW consisted of thirty diamond-shaped hard-standings which were placed in five clusters around the perimeter, the most extensive clusters being to the north. The bomb store and fuel store were also placed on the northern perimeter, with the bomb dump further to the north. The south side of the airfield was the area determined for a watch office to pattern 12779/41, living quarters, and various maintenance buildings formed from Nissen or Maycrete huts. Provision for four T type hangars was also made on the southern perimeter, but only three were erected. Three Blister hangars were also built. The airfield had three runways 1801m (5910ft) long, 975m (3200ft) long, and 1088m (3570ft) long, established in a triangular pattern. The majority of buildings have now been demolished, but the runways and taxi-areas remain.

Event and Historical Information:

St Davids was initially intended to be a base for the US Navy with Consolidated Vultee PB4Y Liberators, but in September 1943 it opened for RAF Coastal Command units instead. The first aircraft were Boeing B17 Flying Fortresses from 206 and 220 squadrons. 517 Meteorological Squadron brought two Handley Page Halifax bombers in November 1943, followed in December by the Halifaxes and Hawker Henleys from 58 and 502 squadrons. 517 Squadron moved to Brawdy when it opened in February 1944. However, 58 Squadron was in residence at St David's until August 1944, and 502 Squadron until September 1944. 202 Squadron returned between June-September 1945 along with 53 Squadron (both equipped with PB4Y Liberator aircraft). The station's headquarters was moved to Brawdy along with the sick bay and workshops facilities in November 1945. St Davids was then placed into care and maintenance before both airfields were passed to the Royal Navy on 1 January 1946. Between 1955 and 1958, whilst Brawdy was being modernised to accept jet aircraft, St Davids was used by the Fleet Requirement Unit (FRU) operated by Airworld Ltd. RCAHMW, June 2002

St Dogmaels

Notes

Western Mail April 2002:

Village to be made whole once more, 170 years on;

"170 years after it was first torn apart, St Dogmaels is to be made whole again. Traditionally belonging to Pembrokeshire, the village of St Dogmaels on the banks of the Teifi was split into two in 1832 when a chunk of it was taken out of Pembrokeshire and given to Cardiganshire. The National Assembly has now approved a Boundary Commission recommendation to unify the village within Pembrokeshire. Historically always part of Pembrokeshire- the river traditionally acted as the boundary marker between it and Cardiganshire-it was first divided up in 1832 for electoral reasons when a third of the village moved into Cardigan. Today there are 307 villagers living in the Cardigan section and 777 in Pembrokeshire. Villagers first asked to be reunified in 1885 and again in 1976 but were turned down. The Boundary Commission has also decided to swap over 2200 hectares of land around Clunderwen, presently in Carmarthenshire, into Pembrokeshire."

St. Dogmaels is a Seaport Town. A fishing village on the Teifi estuary much enlarged over the last 150 years by housing developments. The site is beautiful with houses clinging to steep hillsides above the water. St Dogmael's Abbey was founded in the 12th century; the ruins are now well looked after, and are full of interest. The spacious parish Church (dating mostly from 1847) occupies part of the old abbey site. Opposite the entrance to the Abbey is Y Felin a restored flourmill, which is now in full production. The mill wheel is driven by water from the millpond and the old machinery can be seen in operation.

1091 The battle of Llandudoch (St. Dogmaels)

Fought in 1091 between Gruffydd ap Maredudd and Rhys ap Tewdwr:

"In 1091 . . . once again Rhys [ap Tewdwr] was triumphant; in the battle of Llandudoch, fought near the mouth of the Teifi, Gruffydd [ap Maredudd] was defeated and slain."

J.E.Lloyd , A History of Wales, 1912, vol II, p.398

1091: "And against [Gruffudd ap Maredudd] fought Rhys ap Tewdwr in the battle at Llanwddach; and he drove him to flight and pursued and captured him, and at last he slew him."

Thomas Jones, The Chronicle of the Princes, 1955, p.33

"In the reign of William Rufus, Llewelyn and Einion, sons of Cadivor ab Collwyn, and Einion ab Collwyn, their uncle, formed a conspiracy against Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales; and having prevailed upon Gruffydd ab Meredydd, another nobleman of that country, to join them, advanced with their united forces to St. Dogmael's, where Rhys at that time resided, hoping to attack him by surprise. But Rhys was fully prepared for the encounter, and a severe and well-contested battle took place near the village, in which, after much slaughter on both sides, the confederates were totally defeated. Llewelyn and Einion were both killed in the engagement, and Gruffydd ab Meredydd was taken prisoner after the battle and beheaded, as a traitor to his country."

Samuel Lewis, Topographical Dictionary of Wales, 1833.

Dyfed Archaeological Trust records give a date of 1087 for the battle of Llandudoch and also refer to a battle in 1089 at Colwyn, nearby, recording a "tradition of a battle between Rhys ap Tewdur and the son of Colwyn"; however, none of the above sources refer to another battle.

1802 Barber

Early in the morning after my reaching Cardigan, I made an excursion in search of St Dogmael's Priory, about a mile and a half distant. This fragment of antiquity is very much dilapidated, and boasts scarcely any picturesq.ue appearance; the few parts standing are converted into barns, sheds, and habitations: but enough remains to show the original extent of the Church; which was cruciorm of no considerable dimensions, and of the early Gothic style; in the cemetery adjoining the ruin, and the village Church " a churchyard yew Decayed and worn with age " has a pleasing characteristic effect; and here the scene , finely interspersed with , and overlooking the Tivy is undoubtedly picturesq.ue. This priory was founded for Benedictine monks by Martin de Turribis, a Norman chieftain, who first conquered the surrounding territory called Kames or Kemish, and deluged it with the blood of its natives. This was a common trick for cheating the devil, practised by the organized plunderers of that day. After pillaging a country, and enslaving or massacring the legitimate proprietors, they hoped to expiate their crime and quell the rising qualms of conscience, by appropriating a part of their booty to a monkish foundation.

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales -Dogmael's, St. (St. Dogfael) Lewis

Dogmael's, St. (St. DOGFAEL), a parish, in the union of Cardigan, hundred of Kemmes, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 1 mile (W.) from Cardigan; containing 2478 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and is connected with some events of importance during the earlier periods of the history of the principality. In 987, the Danes, who had effected a landing on this part of the coast, after ravaging and laying waste the surrounding country, plundered and burnt the Church here. In the reign of William Rufus, Llewelyn and Einion sons of Cadivor ab Collwyn, and Einion ab Collwyn their uncle, formed a conspiracy against Rhÿs ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales; and having prevailed upon Gruydydd ab Meredydd, another chief of that country, to join them, advanced with their united forces to St. Dogmael's, where Rhÿs at that time resided, hoping to attack him by surprise. But Rhÿs was fully prepared for the encounter, and a severe and well-contested battle took place near the village, in which, after much slaughter on both sides, the confederates were totally defeated. Llewelyn and Einion were both killed in the engagement, and Gruydydd was taken prisoner after the battle, and beheaded as a traitor. Einion ad Collwyn, the only leader who escaped, fled for refuge to Iestyn ab Gwrgan, Lord of Morganwg, who was at that time at enmity with Rhÿs; and, suggesting to him the fatal expedient of having recourse to Norman auxiliaries, introduced into that part of the country a power which afterwards displayed itself in violent acts of aggression, finally depriving Iestyn of his dominions, which were distributed among the Norman knights.

A Monastery of the order of Tirone was begun here by Martin de Tours, who forcibly obtained possession of the district of Kemmes, in the reign of William the Conqueror. It was completed by his son, Robert Fitz-Martin, in the reign of Henry I.; and was dedicated to St. Mary . Its revenue, at the time of the Dissolution, was estimated at £96. 0. 2., and the Monastery was granted to John Bradshaw, who lies buried beneath the chancel, under a tombstone bearing the following inscription:—"Hic jacet Johannes Bradshaw, Armiger, qui obiit ultimo die Maii, A.D. 1588." Of this family was Bradshaw who presided at the trial of Charles I. The buildings, which were in the early style of English architecture, appear to have been substantial, and on a considerable scale: the remains consist of part of the choir and transept of the Church, and the refectory, which has been converted into a barn.

Roman Monumental Stone

The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Teivy, and is intersected by a small rivulet, across which, and serving as a foot bridge, was a Roman monumental stone, about five feet and a half in length, bearing the inscription "Acrani Fili: Cvnotami:" it has, however, been removed, and is now placed in the corner of a wall near the Church. The parish comprises 5900 acres. The surrounding scenery is pleasant, and in some parts picturesque; the view embracing the course of the river Teivy to its influx into the sea, with the town of Cardigan and its ancient bridge, is exceedingly interesting. The lands are nearly all inclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is generally fertile and productive. A Salmon fishery is advantageously carried on during the summer, and a herring fishery in the autumn and winter, affording employment to such of the inhabitants as are not engaged in agricultural pursuits. A portion of the town of Cardigan extends into the hamlet of Bridge-End, in this parish, and is now, under the provisions of the Boundary Act, included within the enlarged limits of that borough: one of the Cardigan fairs is held here. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the King's Books at £4. 13. 4., and endowed with private benefaction and royal bounty; net income, £143; patron, the Lord High Chancellor; impropiator, W. Deedes, esq. The impropriate tithes of St. Dogmael's have been commuted for a rent-charge of £408. 11., and the vicarial for one of £70. The Church is dedicated to St. Thomas. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists; and six Sunday schools, one of them in connexion with the Established Church. The union workhouse is situated here. The sum of £3 per annum, partly bequeathed by William Rowland in 1738, and partly by his grandson, is distributed in clothes and money among the poor on Easter Monday. There is a strong chalybeate spring in the parish.

1895 Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmins

About a mile distant from the county-town of Cardigan, but on the Pembrokeshire side of the river, stands the before-mentioned village of St. Dogmaels. The little place is perched upon a rather steep declivity, its comely dwellings clambering up the slope, so that, from the top of the village, one's eye follows the course of the Teivy to the foam fringed shores of Cardigan Bay, and the headland called Pen-Kemaes.

Here the cottage gardens are gay with heliotrope, fuchsias and hydrangea, which brave the winter out in the more sheltered corners ; while the full-rigged flagstaffs that rise amidst the garden plots bespeak the nautical proclivities of the residents.

This village derives its name from the ancient Welsh Monastery of St. Dogmaels, which stood about a mile away at a place still bearing the name of Yr Hen Mynachlog (the Old Monastery). Of this venerable structure, founded by Robert de Turribus, but scanty traces now remain, in the shape of a few ivy-mantled walls pierced with Gothic arches, whose crumbling stones retain the ballflower ornamentation of the Decorated period. The neighbouring parish Church has, alas! been swept and garnished by iconoclastic hands, which have ruthlessly bereft the fabric of every feature of interest.

1923 RCAM St Dogmaels

The present Welsh name for the parish of St Dogmaels is Llandudoch, between which and Llandogfael or Llandygwal is no phonetic connection. It is, however certain that in pre Norman times there was an important Church at Llandudoch, though its exact situation (apart from its identification with St Dogmael) has not been satisfactorily established. A medieval life of Tydecho a Breton saint of the 6th century, states that this saint, with a companion Dogfael, lived together at Llandudoch “which lies in Pembrokeshire on the river Teifi, below Cardigan town, where there has been a large Monastery called St Dogmaels” This is probably the foundation for the statement that “ the nucleus of the abbey of St Dogmaels was furnished by the ancient Church of Llandudoch, near the outlet of the Teifi” (Lloyd Hist Wales p431);but a freshly arrived Norman knight is not likely to have adopted for his newly founded Monastery the dedication to a British saint

That there existed in pre Norman period a small ecclesiastical foundation in the district which became the medieval parish of Llandygfael or St Dogmael's is not to be doubted, and a possible explanation of the association of the two saints is the original joint dedication to the two missionary founders Tudoc and Dogfael;or it may be that there was a second Church, perhaps a capella bearing the name of one or other of the founders, and that it was the Church dedicated to St Tudoc which suffered destruction in the Danish inroad of AD987.

The parish of St Dogmaels was in fact until comparatively recently divided into two portions y plwy and yplwyback – the big and little parish respectively – these divisions closely corresponding to the eastern and western halves of the parish. Moreover, if the contemporaneous existence of two Chapels, one dedicated to St Dogfael, the other to St Tudoc, be considered as in itself probable, the two divisions might be synonymous, St Dogfael's portion with the “big” parish and St Tudoc's with the “little” parish.

In further confirmation of the view that in the pre Norman period the medieval parish of St Dogmaels consisted of two separate parishes, those of St Dogmael; and St Tudoc respectively, or of two distinct portions or townships, the authority of the Rev H J Vincent – A cultured Clergyman and sound antiquary, and vicar of St Dogmaels for forty years (1825 – 1865) writing in Arch Camb 1864 p299) upon the earthwork of Caerau and other antiquities in and around the parish may be quoted “ About 200 yds to the west of the earthwork of Caerau was a square stone building called 'Caerau Bach' which may have been an outpost between Caerau and the sea. A little below Caerau Bach were found about the latter part of the 18th Century, seven urns of which no description can be given, nor have I been able to ascertain what became of them”. Mr Vincent continues; “ My attention has been lately directed to Caerau by a stone coffin enclosure found between the second and third lines of fortification on the east,in what appears to have been an old cemetery extending to the east, north and south of the earthwork. In this place called variously 'Llain yr Eglwys' 'y Fynwent' 'yr Eglwys ddiflodan' [the flowerless Church] .. several graves have been found during the past seventy years” The earthworks of Caerau and the adjacent farm of the same name , are about two miles west of the village of St Dogmaels, and about ¾ of a mile inland from a little creek formed by the embouchure of the Ceibwr stream. The township or hamlet is called Pant y groes, and about a mile to the north is the farm of Hendre. There can be little doubt that the site immediately adjoining the defensive enclosure is that of the burial ground of the destroyed Church of St Tudoc, the Church itself having stood on the north side of the enclosure where the circumvallation has been entirely swept away

It is interesting to find that the name of Dogmael or Dogfael is not met with in connection with the parish of with the abbey, until about the year 1115, when it is first used for both the abbey and parish in the charter of Robert de Turribus, founding the abbey and endowing it with the parish. Llandudoc is heard of no more, except as the Welsh name of the parish which as the Welsh name of the parish which was known to the Normans as St Dogmaels; while it is not without significance that the name of St Dogmael or Dogfael, though , of course, as Welsh as that of Tudoc, is never used in the form Llandogfael for the parish, though it is quite possible that both Llandudoc and Llandogfael were contemporaneously in vogue for the two divisions of the “big” and “little” parish.

Moreover, as regards the original bipartite division of the parish, it should be noted that though there can be no doubt the entire present parish of St Dogmaels with much lands besides, was included in the patrimony of Martin de Turribus, the grant, the grant of the village Church and its tithes to the Normanized monastic foundation carried only the tithe accruing from the plwy mawr, which consisted of the abbey and Bridgeend [of Cardigan]. The tithe of the St Tudoc hamlet of Pant y gres and Cippyn by some process of which there is no record, had become vested in the Bishop and chapter of St David's. A farm near Caerau id called Penrallt yr Esgob to this day. Further, as evidencing the existence of the parish of Llandudoch, is the statement in the Pem Arch Survey that a craved stone fie of an ecclesiastic was found about the year 1850, built into a wall on the farm of Hendre which is situated in the township of Panyt y groes and in the district associated with St Tudoc. Hendre, the seat of the descendants of a line of Welsh chieftains, continued to flourish as the Welsh counterpart of an English Manor house and in the year 1442 the member of the Lloyd family then in possession obtained an indulgence from pope Eugenius to install therein a portable altar “- altare portabile ad missa at alia divina officia etiam ante diem st locis interdictis celebranda” (PRO Papal Registers ix 306). This probably marks the abandonment of St Tudocs, and an attempt to provide for divine worship for a district that could not be served from the single remaining Church of St Dogmaels.

Finally the tall squared monolith bearing incised characters within compartments usually referred to as the manian Fawr stone from its preservation at that residence prior to its recent removal to the abbey ruins, was at an earlier period used as a gate post on the farm of Pant Tiron, whence it was removed to Manian Fawr. Now Pant Tirion is less than a mile from the earthwork of Caerau and the suggested site of St Tudoc Church. It is, therefore , highly probable that this stone was brought from the ruins of the small building, and in such case would actually be one of the few surviving memorials of St Tudoc.

The parish Church of St Dogmaels would seem to have always stood on or near the spot occupied by the present Church , and the beautiful situation probably led Robert de Turribus to place his monastic foundation near to it. Whether the buildings described by Mr Bury as seeming to be “of an earlier date than the [abbey] Church” was the earlier Church of the parish, it is now impossible to ascertain for “this interesting and well preserved little structure was demolished.... and its materials used in the rebuilding of the vicarage and the construction of the present stable which stands near the pond at the extreme eastern end of the abbey enclosure” (H M Vaughan F. S. A. in y Cymmrodor 1917 xxvii 10.) Mr Vaughan is of the opinion that this building was the chapter house of the abbey, but this is not probable. It is more likely to have been the tha Chapel of St Julian, which the first ministers Account of the Abbey Properties taken after the dissolution of the house, shows to have stood on the manorial demesne, and to have been converted into a private dwelling in the occupation of a certain Howel (Pub Rec Office: Ministerial Accounts 27 – 8 Henry VIII no 5287) The parish Church is dedicated to St Thomas the Martyr, which points either to a substitution for an earlier dedication or the erection of a new Church subsequently to the martyrdom of Becket in 1170; and as to the parish Church of St Thomas of St Thomas itself Mr Vaughan ads (op cit p14): “ Apparently in medieval times the village Church stood on a hillock between the two mills due east of the abbey, at a spot now called Shingrug. Here in October 1905 when a couple of old cottages were pulled down to make room for a new villa, a number of graves were discovered. The eastern wall of one of these cottages lso exhibited some tracery in local red sandstone, and on examination I considered it to have formed part of the chief window of a small ancient Church or Chapel. Apaprently it was not before the close of the 17th century that the original site of the parish Church was abandoned and a new building erected, largely of materials taken from the monastic ruins, a little north of the abbey Church. The west end of this second parish Church is shown in Buck's view as existing in 1740; whilst Gastineau's sketch of a later date included its chancel of bastard Gothic. In or about 1847 this Church was replaced by the larger edifice which now exists”.

RCAM Church of St Thomas St Dogmaels

The present parish Church is a modern structure, built within the precincts of the former abbey of St Dogmael's, and probably out of much of its remains. Beyond two oak chairs, bearing the dates 1700 and 1738 respectively, no furniture or fittings that may have belonged to any earlier edifice have been preserved –visited 12th June 1914

[The present edifice seems to have had several predecessors. Of the immediately preceding Church the following interesting particulars are to be found in the churchwarden's presentment for 1684

“Our bells want casting anew, and our chancel to be rebuilt.... Welsh and English Bible of ye last translation .. There is no mansion(vicarage) house, and there never was any belonging to ye minister of our parish ...Our Minister doth not himself, or suffer any other to keep or appoint a conventicle within our parish... Henry Poulton, John Poulton, Thomas Poulton and Rees ap John and his wife have all been excommunicated long ago for non conformity. The Church of St. Dogmaels, the old Welsh name of which was Llandudoch, was a very old foundation, and was originally dedicated to St. Dogfael, the son of Ithel ap Ceredig ap Cunedda Wledig, and was possibly established by that Saint. Very little is known about St. Dogfael, and it is impossible to fix even approximately the date of the foundation of Llandudoch Church. It would appear however that the Church must have been in existence prior to the year 988, as the Annales Cambric state that in that year St Davids, LlanbAdarn, Llan Illtyd, Llancalvan, and Llan Deth-och [Llandudoch] were devastated by pirates.

On the conquest of Kemes by the Normans the Church of Llandudoch was seized by the invaders, and Robert Martin, the son, and his wife Matilda or Maud, granted to William, the abbot, and the convent of Tiron, the ancient Church of St. Dogmael, with the adjacent land called Landodog. This grant, which is recited in Letters Patent of 20 Ric. II., is undated, but according to George Owen, Robert Martin, the son founded the Monastery of St. Dogmaels in the time of Henry I. (who reigned from 1100 to 1135), or else in the reign of Stephen. - Owens Pem, pt. II., p. 437.

The Annales Cambric record that pirates in 1138 plundered the town and Church of Llandudoch id est de Sancto Dogmaelo, and carried away great spoil to their ships, thus affording evidence as to the identity of the two names, and also suggesting that at that date the dedication of the Church had not been changed to St. Thomas.

On the dissolution of St. Dogmaels Abbey the patron-age of the Church came into the hands of Henry. VIII., who on 10 Mar, 1537, granted a lease of the abbey of St. Dogmael and the rectory of St. Thomas in St. Dogmaels, and other property to John Bradshaw of Ludlow. Salop, for 21 years, at the annual rent of £3 4s. On 10 Nov., 1543, the fee simple of the site of the abbey with other property, part of which was included in the lease, was acquired from the Crown by John Bradshaw of Pres-tende [Presteign], Radnorshire, for £512, but the patronage of the Church of St. Dogmaels was not included in the purchase. - Pat. Rolls.

Blaenywaun Baptist Chapel was first built in 1745 with a thatched roof. This was rebuilt in 1795, 1838 and again in 1885. The present Chapel, dated 1895, was designed by architect Owen Lewis of London and built in the Sub-classical style. The Chapel has a gable entry plan, 2 storeys, a 3-bay facade and slate gable roof. Each end bay has a tall semi-circular headed window opening with keystone and projecting cill and 18-panes with radiating heads. A similar window to the end bays is located above the porch - 6-pane with radiating heads. The semi-circular headed porch contains a small semi-circular headed stained glass windows on each side of the wall.

Inscribed and Carved Stones. RCAM

Of the collection of carved and inscribed stones, some were almost certainly associated with early ecclesiastical sites in distant parts of the present parish and the rest probably belong to one or other of the St Dogmael edifices. They have been brought together and housed either in the parish Church or the abbey ruins. They comprise the following:--

The Sigranus Stone

A bilingual inscription cut on a hard gritstone; 80in in length and 14in wide, broken in two. The Roman capitals Read SAGRANI FILI CUNOTAMI. The ogam reads SAGRAGNI MAQU CUNATAMI.

In the Abbey ruins

A pre Norman Cross Inscribed stone

The lower portion of a pillar 5ft 10in in height which, when entire, probably stood about 7ft above ground.

It bore a cross of the usual Celtic type, having the cross arms confined in a circle, and with an extension of the lower limb down the stone to about the same length(7in) as the diameter of the circle. In the present instance the surface of the stone did not possess sufficient width for the intended circle, with the result that the circle assumed the shape of an irregular and sharp pointed oval. Possibly for the express purpose of defacing the most revered emblem of the Christian faith, the stone has been broken almost exactly along the line of the cross arms. Some comparatively modern vandal has carved his initials in the surviving quadrants of the circle.

Wheel Cross Head

This fragment of an interesting carved stone was discovered by our Assistant Inspecting Officer on the occasion of his official visit to the abbey ruins. The stone is 55in in length and 22 in in width, and has uncised upon it the upper part of a wheel cross of simple design, 38in long and 19in wide. The stone has been split horizontally. Further search would probably reveal the missing fragments. The type of cross is that seen upon the Capel Colman stone and the Dobituci stone at Clydey.
RCAM

The Manian Fawr Stone .

This stone stands 7ft high , is 16in wide and 14in thick. On its face is carved an unusual pattern of crosses, circles, lines and dots RCAM

Cross Stone

A stone, 56 in high and 11 ins wide. On its face (slightly broken at the top) is a cross within a double circle; The lower limb is extended for about two thirds of the length of the stone; midway the inner lines of the ornament are twisted into spirals on either side of the line running to the foot of the cross which terminates in two concentric rings. RCAMs

A Cross Stone, imperfect

A stone 53 in in length, and 22 in wide; being a fragment. The figure that remains is that of a lower limb of the cross. It has been placed upside down in its new position in the Church. RCAM

The Altar Stone

This is now placed upright against the east wall of the chancel on the south side of the altar. On its face are five incised crosses. It has a length of 80 in a width of 35 in and a thickness of 3 ¾ in. One Angle is slightly damaged. It is probably coeval with the first Norman Church RCAM

1859 St Dogmaels Abbey -Visit by Archaeology Cambrensis Association Report

Friday August 19th

The members started out this morning ,on foot to visit St Dogmael's Abbey and Church, where they were received by the Rev H J Vincent, who pointed out the general outline of the ruins, which are his private property, and which are most carefully protected from further dilapidation.

Mr Talbot Bury then proceeded to describe the more particular features of the ruins. After pointing out the only remaining portions, namely, the west and north walls, the north transept and the remains of some buildings attached to the east side, Mr Bury observed that there was no difficulty in arriving at the plan of the original structure. It had been a cruciform Church, having a nave with no aisles and transepts, and a very extensive choir. In the west wall are the remains of a very large window, but without any vestiges of tracery. The jamb mouldings , however, may be referred to a date between 1280 and 1320, which date is confirmed by a doorway at the western end of the north wall having the Ball flower running round the arched head. In the north wall are some curious recesses evidently intended for sepulchral monuments , but there is no evidence of their ever having been used for that purpose, unless they have been subsequently stripped of the freestone with which they must have been lined and moulded, or they may have been purposely left unfinished and walled up, to be opened and completed when required. The north transept has undergone considerable alterations at a later period, and been used as as a Lady, or other Chapel, perhaps a sepulchral one, as the same kind of recesses before described occur on east side of the altar. The roof is of stone, and of good design of fan tracery groining, springing from richly ornamental corbels; only a few feet however of the springers of this rich groining remain. The windows of this transept are of the same character as the roof namely of the period of the reign of HenryVII. The other portions of the building above ground ,are on the south side, and consist of a part of the cloister walls and the south side of the refectory. This portion of the domestic buildings is very interesting, from having the staircase constructed within the wall leading to the remains of the pulpit, which had a window at the back, as in the well known examples of the refectories of the abbeys at Beaulieu, Walsingham, Chester and elsewhere. About 150 ft east of the refectory, and nearly in the same line, is a building in more perfect condition than any other part of the ruins, about 38ft long by 20ft 6in; but it is not easy to determine its character, unless it belonged to the abbots residence and was either a Chapel or refectory, as some thought for strangers. The recesses in the south wall, apparently occupied by a sedilia with the remains of a piscina do not favour the latter supposition. There is also a recess, about 5ft deep by 14ft long in the centre of the south wall, which may as well be supposed to have been used for a pulpit as for any other purpose. The building seems to be of an earlier date than the Church, and its construction is of better masonry, which exhibits alternate rows of light and dark stones being an very early example of a style of decoration supposed to be exclusively Italian. The roof is of stone, vaulted, in the form of a pointed arch, but without ribs, and has been ingeniously constructed to avoid all outward thrust of the walls. Over the panel of the east window is a corbel supported by an angel. That this, and probably other parts of the abbey now not existing above ground are of a date prior to the principal remains of the Church is evident from the large quantity of fragments of mouldings or piers and arches found in different portions of the ruins. Some are transitional between Norman and Early Pointed styles – undoubted remains of the original Church completed in the time of Henry I, by Robert son of Martin de Tours who was seized of the Lordship of Cemaes in the reign of William the Conqueror. In concluding his observations Mr Bury congratulated the members on the fact that these interesting ruins were under the protection of so worthy a proprietor as Mr Vincent had shown himself, by the care he had taken, not only in preventing further destruction, but by the labour and great expense he had incurred, at various times, in strengthening weaker portions of the buildings, without which precautions the ruins would not have been so well preserved as they are at present; and he wished most heartily that all other proprietors of such remains could be induced to follow the example which their Local secretary for Pembrokeshire has set them.

St Dogmael's Abbey. RCAM

3/4m W of Cardigan Bridge, Dyfed, west Wales.

Founded about 1115 for a prior and 12 monks of the order of Tiron, by Robert FitzMartin Lord of Cemaes on the site of St Dogmael's cell (6th C prince who became a monk in order to help crippled children). St Dogmaels occupied the site of a pre-Norman Monastery. It was raised to the status of abbey in 1120, and the monks followed an austere life based on the rule of St Benedict. The surviving ruins span four centuries of monastic life and show much alteration. Parts of the Church and cloister are 12th century. However, the west and north walls of the nave, which stand almost to their full height, are of the 13th century, and a fine north doorway has 14th-century ballflower ornament. The north transept is Tudor, retaining elaborate corbels which supported the stone vaulting. Notice here the carved figures with an angel representing St Matthew, a lion for St Mark and the Archangel Michael. The footings of the chapter house can be seen to the west of the cloister, with the adjacent monks infirmary standing almost to roof level. At the Dissolution, the Church continued to be used for a time by the parish, and a rectory was built into the southwest corner of the cloister.

The Benedictine Abbey of St Dogmaels

The ruins of the abbey of St Mary the Virgin founded in 1115 for monks of the reformed Benedictine Order of Tiron, stand south of the parish churchyard, from which they are separated by a wall. The remains of the abbey Church consists of the north transept and the north and west walls of an aisleless nave. To the southeast of the Church portions of two buildings are still standing, of which the eastern appears to have been a Chapel, possibly attached to the infirmary; the western building is a mere fragment containing two recesses with segmental pointed heads which may date from the late 13th century. The nave of the Church belongs to the 14th century and the north transept to the 15th century. On the day of his visit our Inspecting Officer found an interesting stoup concealed behind a thick growth of ivy. The basin has a diameter of 15in; on its front in high relief, is a bearded face crowned with a circlet. These details are much defaced. It may be of the 14th century date – visited 10th June 1914.

1917 The Benedictine Abbey of St Mary at St Dogmaels – H M Vaughan F.S.A.

No doubt there existed at or near the present St Dogmaels of Llandudoch in pre Norman times a small Celtic monastical foundation which derived its name from Dogfael, the great grandson of Cunedda Wledig, who flourished in the 5th century. This former Celtic house however did not occupy the site of the later Benedictine Abbey of Robert Fitz Martin, son and heir of Martin, commonly named Martin de tours, the original conqueror and grandee of the Lord-ship of Camaes or Kemeys. Of this Martin the Elder we have on the authority of Mr Horace Round, our leading mediaeval historian that “nothing is really known about him” beyond the circumstances of this conquest and grant of land in Dyfed. Nevertheless, Mr Round suggests that he may be identical with “Martinus de Wales” whose name appears first in the foundation charter of Totnes priory in Devon, which shire was the home of this powerful family. In any case it was the son and heir of this knight, Robert Fitz Martin, second Lord of Cemaes, acting probably under the expressed wish of his late father and certainly with the warm approval of his mother, who in 1113 founded a priory of French monks at St Dogmaels, which five years later he enlarged and raised to the rank of an abbey dedicated to the blessed Virgin.

“A certain Robert of most noble birth approached a holy man beyond the seas and taking with him 13 of his disciples passed through Norman and English territories and reaching the farthest limits of the land of Wales on the coast of the Irish sea close to the river Teifi he established first indeed a cell but afterwards with an equal number of monks together with with an abbot at their request as we have mentioned he established a Monastery fitted with all appurtenances” (J H Round Calendar of Documents of France, Preface, p. xxxv)

Now “the holy man beyond the seas” was undoubtedly the blessed Bernard of Abberville, who according to the Petits Bollandistes, was born in 1046 and died April 14th 1116. This Bernard founded in or about 1113 a community or reformed order under the Benedictine rule at Tiron au Perch near Chartres. Special points of discipline marked this new order, a salient feature being the insistence on skilled labour by the monks themselves for the support of the new foundation.. They were to be painters,carvers, joiners, smiths etc. Their habit was at first a light grey, but later changed to black. The Order was started under favourable auspices in France, and quickly attracted the attention of King Henry I of England, who probably himself recommended the new Order to Robert Fitz Martin. Only this one house at St Dogmaels, however seems to have been formed in England and Wales, Though four were founded in Scotland under royal patronage. The Order of Tironian Benedictines continued to exist in France until the close of the 17th century.

The date of Robert Fitz Martin's first visit to the newly founded house of the blessed Bernard of Abberville at Tiron was apparently the year 1113, and the date of his second visit 1118, two years after the death of the Saint. On the first occasion Robert brought over thirteen of these Tironian monks to St Dogmaels, and with that number founded a priory as a cell, or subsidiary house to the mother abbey of Tiron; whilst five years later he again crossed to France and returned with an additional thirteen monks from Tiron, whom he also installed at St Dogmaels with an abbot at their head, one Fulchard by name.

Henceforth St Dogmaels ranked as an Independent house, no doubt in close inter-communication with the parent abbey of Tiron during the whole period of its existence, but in no wise subordinate to it. That this abbey was founded as such in or about the year 1118 is proved by the two facts that at the consecration of Abbot Fulchard there was present Bernard, Bishop of St David's who was only elected in 1115; and that the original confirmation of the grant by Henry I includes the name of Prince William, the English King's heir, who was drowned in the sinking of the White Ship on November 28th 1120. (Cartulary of the Abbey of the Holy Trinity of Tiron vol i p 41). The hitherto usually accepted date of September 1126 for the abbey's original charter, which is given by Dugdale is therefore eight years too late.

In this pious and munificent foundation at St Dogmaels. Robert Fitz Martin was also generously aided by his wife Maud Peveral, as well as by his mother Geva (? Genevieva), the widow of the first Lord of Cemaes, and such being the case there seems no reason to discredit the popular tradition that both parents of Robert Fitz Martin, as well as himself and his wife Maud were buried "in medio choro" of the newly erected Church.

Of the many possessions of the Abbey we need only state here that they included the namor of St Dogmaels, which extended from the little stram called Brenan or Piliau to the mouth of the Teifi; the Chapelries of St Dogmaels, Llantood, Monington, Moylgrove, Eglwysrw, Bayvil, Maencloshog, Monochlog – du Fishguard and Llandeilo; the island and subsidiary priory of Caldey (Geva 's gift); the rich cell of Pill Priory on Milford Haven and the valuable manor of Rattrey in South Devon, which English estate was retained by the Abbey till its dissolution. Of the two cells, Caldey paid the annual sum of £5 10s 11d to the Abbey and Pill £9 6s 8d. This last mentioned cell was founded towards the close of the 12th century by the de la Roche family, and had a considerable private income of its own. In addition to Caldey and Pill, the Abbey also owned the small Tironian cell of Glascareg in co. Wexford, which paid annually to the mother house £3 6s 8d., though the last abbot of St Dogmaels declared to the Royal commissioners in 1534 that his Abbey had received no payment from this Irish source for forty years past.

The record of the Abbey's existance over four centuries seems on the whole to have been prosperous and uneventful, if we except the successful raid carried out by Scandinavian pirates at the estuary of the Teifi in 1138, when the newly founded Benedictine Abbey suffered considerably.

Of the many abbots the names of eleven only have been preserved for us and none of these rose to any public eminence.

In 1188 the celebrated Gerald de Barri with Archbishop Baldwin spent the night here as the guests of Prince Rhys during the English Primate's famous Itinery of the Welsh sees.

At the close of the 12th century one Walter, a cousin of Gerald's and a rival candidate for the vacant bishopric of St David's, was abbot of St Dogmaels. Gerald speaks of this man as "an illiterate monk who could not Read his Psalter".; but then the versatile historian was rarely justified in his sweeping charges of vice or incompetence against those who opposed his will. That the Abbey wasa well endowed and kept in good repair is evident from the surviving architectural fragments, which go to prove there were constant embellishments and rebuilding in progress here during four hundred years

In July 1504 during a visitation of the deanery of Cemaes, Dom. Lewis, Lord Abbot of St Dogmaels, as well as the priors of Pill and Caldy were interrogated as to the condition of their houses, and stated in their replies (as one would naturally expect!) that "all the brethren were of good and honest conversation and obedient at their free will"

1534 Thirty years later and we have the dismal story of the suppression of the Abbey.

This matter is clearly set forth in a well preserved document acknowledging the Royal supremacy, which is now in the Records Office London. The deed of surrender is signed by the last Abbot, William Hire (to whom an annual pension of twenty marks was subsequently granted) and by eight of his monks. It is sealed with the Abbatial Seal, elliptical in form and representing the Virginal and Child seated beneath a gothic canopy and bearing on its bordure the legend "S. COMUNE.SANTI. DOG[MAE]LIS.DE Kemmays."

It did not take long to disperse the estates of the Abbey whose revenue is variously stated at figures which in one instance are put as low as £68 and in another place described as amounting so high as £120 and over, so that probably the commonly quoted rental of £96 derived from the Valor Ecclesiasticus may be accepted as fairly correct. Of the Pembrokeshire estates it is sufficient here to mention the manor of St Dogmaels and the monastic buildings and grounds, otherwise called Llandre were, together with Caldey Island, acquired by John Bradshaw of Presteign for the sum of £512 odd. This grand sum did not, however, include the patronage of the parish Church of St Thomas at St Dogmaels, and its Chapelrys of Llantodd and Montington which remained with the Crown.

Bradshaws

In all probability large portions of the abbey were now pulled down and utilized for the building of the Bradshaw manor house, which remained the residence of this family for over one hundred years. The Bradshaws whose early pedigree is given in Lewtn Dwnn's Visitations 9Vol I p 257 are mentioned in local annals for some four or five generations, one of them, John Bradshaw being High Sheriff of Pembrokeshire in 1571. This man, who was either the son or grandson of the original purchaser from the Crown, is almost certainly the John Bradshaw whose monumental slab still exists. He died in 1588, and was apparently father of William Bradshaw, MP for Cardigan borough in 1603. Other members of this family appear in local history, including Captains Edmund and John Bradshaw who were amongst the captured Royalists Officers in the garrison of Pill Fort in 1643.

Parry

This event was shortly before the sale of the manor of St Dogmaels by the Bradshaws to David Parry of Neuadd-Trefawr, near Cardigan. The Parrys held the manor for over two centuries but do not seem to have resided within the abbey precincts, where the old Bradshaw manor house was probably allowed to fall into decay, so that its actual site is now a matter of conjecture. In 1862 the ultimate heir of these Parrys, David K W Webley-Parry sold this family estate; the farm of Pentood near the mouth of the Piliu and the foreshore rights of the manor being purchased by David Davies of Castle Green Cardigan; whilst the farms of Manian fawr, Manian fach, Poppit House and Ysgyborwen, whose names occur often in the lists of the monastic property, were sold to Thomas Harman Brenchley, of Glaneirw.

Ruins

It is of course certain that large portions of the abbey were demolished to erect the Bradshaw residence, and it is also probable that much material was filched for building purposes in the village. On the whole, therefore it is remarkable that so much of the Abbey should survive today, for the ruins at St Dogmaels are more extensive and present greater features of architectural interest than do the existing monastic remains at Strata Florida, Talley, Cwnhir, Haverfordwest or Whitland. The earliest view of the abbey we possess is that drawn by Buck in 1740. This drawing, which is well executed, is taken from the south west and shows much of the salient features of the present time, with the exception of some tall ruins on the north side of the Choir that have since totally disappeared. This plan, made two centuries after the Dissolution is particularly valuable to us being evidently the product of a skilled draftsman, whereas the various drawings in the illustrated books that appeared in the early part of the nineteenth century are often mere picturesque sketches, and consequently somewhat misleading. This is especially true of Hassall's "Chapel of St Dogmael's Abbey", which gives a most incorrect impression of the interior of the north transept. Gastineau's drawing in "Wales Illustrated" of the exterior of this transept is better, and better still is Hughes's charming little cut of the same subject in his "Beauties of Cambria". Both of these views are so planned as to introduce in the foreground the ancient gnarled yew tree which still flourishes opposite the porch of the present parish Church of St Thomas. Of descriptions of the Abbey ruins we possess practically nothing till the visit of the Cambrian Archaeological Association to Cardigan in August 1859 at a time when a really able and enthusiastic antiquary the Rev Henry James Vincent, was vicar of St Dogmaels. Here again however we are doomed to disappointment, for although the learned Vicar read aloud a paper on the abbey at one of the public meetings, his manuscript was for some reason or other never printed in the Arch Camb Journal, although its publication was promised by the Editor. In the summer of 1865 Mr Vincent died, and in the subsequent notice recording his death allusion is again made to his MS history of the Abbey "which he had just completed and which was now being arranged for publication in the Journal of the Association". But the promised monograph never appeared and the manuscript itself seems to have been lost, though how and when does not transpire.

Fortunately, however a short address on the abbey ruins in 1859 by Mr Talbot Bury, an antiquary of some standing has been preserved in the Arch Camb Journal for that year and this account is invaluable to us at the present day. Mr Bury describes the ruins carefully and although some of his deductions appear to me erroneous yet it is evident he understood his subject. Perhaps the most important statement of this brief lecture is Mr Bury's detailed account of a building within the Abbey precincts which unhappily no longer exists 150ft east of the so-called Refectory mentioned by Mr Bury as "being in a more perfect condition than any other part of the ruins.

I am of the opinion myself that this building was the Chapter House but in any case all speculation is useless, as about seven years later, shortly after Mr Vincent's death, the interesting and well preserved little structure was demolished by the new vicar the Rev Daniel Jones and its materials used in the rebuilding of the Vicarage and the construction of the present stable which stands near the pond at the extreme eastern end of the Abbey enclosure. Mr Bury's account of this now destroyed appanage of the Abbey is particularly fortunate, as Buck's view of the ruins in 1740 does not apparently extend to the point where this building stood till so recently as 1866 1859 great praise is bestowed by leading members of the Arch Camb Association on the care taken of the ruins by their natural guardian Mr Vincent, but with that excellent man's decease in 1865 no further effort was made to maintain still less to repair these precious monastic relics. Apart from the flagrant piece of vandalism just related decay and neglect became visible everywhere, and it was only so lately as this present year (1916) that thanks to a generous gift from Mr John T Lewis of Gwynfryn Llansrth, Cardiganshire that any steps have been taken towards their preservation.

In the summer of 1916 the whole of the ivy, the unchecked growth of half a century was completely stripped from the masonry, thereby exposing many features of interest that had been hidden for nearly two generations.

2007 St Dogmaels Abbey

The medieval Abbey of St Mary at St Dogmaels was founded in 1115 by the FitzMartin family of Cemais and was of the Order of Tiron. Caldey Priory, Caldey Island was a daughter house to St Dogmael's. established in The abbey was re-modelled in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries and in the sixteenth century the northern transept was given a fan vaulted roof.

Substantial remains of the abbey Church survive, including the western end wall, the north wall, northern transept and the eastern end walls of the crypt. Extensive monastic buildings also survive to the south of the Abbey, and a detached building of the late thirteenth century, possibly an infirmary Chapel or infirmary is located to the south-east. RCAHMW, 3rd October 2007.

1402 St Dogmells Abbey

Guy etc., our beloved sons in Christ and of religious men brother Philip Vader, abbot of the Monastery St.Dogmells in Kemmeys of the order of St Benedict of Tiron of our diocese, and the convent of the same, subject to our ordinary jurisdiction in head and members etc. (as above). Whereas by our ordinary authority making a visitation in every deed your said Monastery, on the seventh and tenth days of the month January, lawfully continued, in the year of the Lord 1402. And fifth year of our consecration, found, among other things, in same visitation that:- first by pestilence then by your neglect the usual number of the Canons serving God, in the same Monastery is so diminished, in such excessive number that where there used to be a full convent of honest monks scarcely three monks, professed, are now conversant in the same, consuming the sustenance of a very large number, to the manifest withdrawal of divine worship.

For which cause we enjoin on you that you make provision of honest persons to be clothed with you in the habit of regulars, whose conversation in times past may afford a good presumption for the future, so that by the feast of Pentecost next there may be conversant nine in number at the least, in order that by the multiplication of intercessors the gifts of spiritual Grace may be increased. And because we found that from the excessive Wandering of the lay brothers among secular persons and dishonourable frequenting of unlawful places, to wit taverns, very great evils and scandals have resulted to the same Monastery in persons and things, by necessity of which things we are bound to find a fit remedy for the future, we for this cause can be approved of.

Also we enjoin that from the opening of the kitchen of the convent until there shall be six in number, the abbot shall have the usual abbots portion, and after that they shall be more than six in number he shall have and take in all the portion of two monks twice a week at least.

Also we enjoin that brother Howel Lange, your fellow monk and confrere, on account of his excess and the evil deeds committed by him, which for a reason we do not now set out, for one whole year from the day of the date of these presents, shall not drink wine, nor metheglin, on which it has been his habit to get drunk, but he shall give away and distribute his portion of wine to the poor in the abbots presence; and in this year he shall not go out of the bounds of the said Monastery unless in the abbots company.

Also we enjoin on the same monks and lay brothers that none of them shall go out of the bounds of the Monastery without the special licence of the abbot or in his absence of his deputy, and that such license shall not be too liberal or too continuous.

Also that no women suspected in regard to the monks shall by any means lodge in the town itself but they shall be removed altogether, under the penalty written below: also that no lay brother there shall have the witness of his iniquity in the Monastery aforesaid that the goods of the Monastery be not prodigally consumed by the sustenance of such.

Also since we have been informed, as found by experience, that brother David Lloid, your fellow monk, has culpably lapsed into crime of apostasy (we say it with grief), going forth from the Monastery itself and holding himself aloof among secular persons, neglecting the discipline of his order and deserting the cloister, we therefore, since by the judgement of a strict balance his blood may be required at your hands, enjoin on you under the penalty written below that you diligently enquire for this your brother and when found bring him back to the fold and the cloister itself, so treating him with the charity that leads the way chastising him according to the discipline of the order, that his reproof may turn out for an example to others, and that for his reversion and conversion from error according to the in your Church and cloister and the too ready means of entrance to the same and exit from the same, at all hours as it were, the silence and contemplation of the religious, according to the requirement of their religion, cannot be observed, we enjoin on you therefore that on the north side of your Church and Monastery, no door and no gate and no means of access to the town be left open by day or night, except from the beginning of the mass of the blessed Mary until the end of high mass in the choir, and except for a sudden passing of the abbot or the cellarer to view the Husbandry in the field on that side, after whose passing they shall be closed at once.

Also we have found in the same visitation that on account of the excessive and day and night vigils of the monks in the house of mercy, not for the sake of contemplation but of idle gossip together and drinking, the bowels of mercy are burst asunder, evil speaking arises and drunkenness reigns, for which cause we wishing to apply a remedy for this disease and take away from among you the occasion of evil, enjoin on you that in the same house of pretended mercy, except in the vigil of All Saints the week of Christmas and the feast of the Purification of the blessed Mary, no fire shall be made or kept up, or except at the coming of frost or intolerable cold and while these reign they shall have a fire at the middle hour, by dispensation of the abbot not for the sake of converse together but of warmth, for a suitable time and the portion of the monks in drink and candles shall be diminished according to the discretion of the abbot, since all which is excessive is counted for a vice; and no layman or secular person shall be permitted to be present at the monks collations except only a servant appointed for these by the abbot. On you all and singular in virtue of the holy obedience etc. (as above as far as the word excused.) In witness whereof, etc. Dated at Carmarthen, 14 January, 1402, etc.

The State of Education in Wales 1847

The parish has a resident Clergyman and is mainly agricultural but also some fishing. The earnings of the fishermen unknown but the agricultural labourers get 8d a day with food and 1s a day on their own finding. The moral character is not good with drunkenness to some extent and want of chastity. Landed proprietors are resident but there is no information on them subscribing for education or on how many farmer pay over £100 a year in rent. There was also no information on how many children were without education. Information from Henry J Vincent, St Dogmaels.

Parish of St Dogmells – Mrs Bevan's Circulating School – On the 27th of January I visited the above school; it was held in a Chapel belonging to the Church. There was no school furniture in the place. The master could scarcely speak any English; five only out of the 32 present could be formed into a class to read the Testament. They attempted to read a chapter in St Like, which all did wretchedly ill. They knew nothing beyond the answer to a few unconnected scriptural questions.

Union Workhouse School I visited this school on the 27th of January. It was held in a room in the workhouse. Everything about it seemed very comfortable. The children had just been dismissed and were preparing for dinner. The school was conducted by the house master's daughter. She told me that the attendance was very irregular in consequence of the children leaving the house for a time, and then returning. There was nothing taught at the time of my visit but reading ---David Lewis – Assistant

Chapel Hill Day School On the 27th of January I visited the above school. The children were not present to be examined. The school was kept in a small room, lighted by one window, and one small fireplace. Ther furniture consisted of one desk for the master, three small desks for the pupils and a few benches, all in indifferent repair. The schoolmaster seemed an intelligent man, spoke English well, and the Vicar gave him a good character. David Lewis – Assistant

Former British School, St Dogmaels

The former British School at St Dogmaels was opened circa 1869 and is marked on the first edition Ordnance Survey 25" map, of 1890. It was a single storey schoolroom with two projecting wings, two entrances at the front and a central ventilation tower in the roof.

The Old School (Former Chapel), David Street, St Dogmaels

The old school in David Street was originally an early nineteenth-century Chapel and converted to a school in the later nineteenth-century. It comprises a single-storey two-room school with two low single storey wings projecting to west. S.L. Evans RCAHMW 2009

Names --Pigot & Co. South Wales directory for 1830

St Dogmells, or Dogmaels, is a scattered village, one mile from Cardigan; seated on the side of a Hill on the banks of the Tivie, in a fertile part of the country, and surrounded by numerous orchards, the produce of which forms a trade of consequence to the inhabitants. This place was once noted for its Abbey, the which, from the specimens of arches and ornamental mouldings in the existing remnants of the choir, as well as foundations and other fragments of buildings to be traced, must have been a splendid building, and covered a considerable space.

The parish Church is erected on the site, and partly out of its ruins. The living is a vicarage, in the gift of the King; the Rev H J Vincent is the present vicar.

The population of St Dogmells consists (at this period 1830) of between 700 and 800 inhabitants.

1864 Caerau In The Parish Of St Dogmells Arch Camb1864

My object in writing this paper is to jot down a few particulars with reference to certain places in this parish not visited by the Archaeological Association during the Meeting at Cardigan in August 1859.

At the western extremity of this parish, about two miles and a half from the village, on the brow of a Hill overlooking the village of Moilgrove, in a field called " Park y gaer,"on the farm of Penallt ceibwr, is a curious earthwork called " Caerau,"and marked in the Ordnance Map, " Castell." It consists of three concentric, circular embankments within and above each other, at intervals of about twenty yards ; with an elevation in the second of two feet, and in the third, or innermost, of four feet.

The prospect here is exceedingly extensive, and the position very commanding. What might have been the original height of the embankments, it is now impossible to determine, as they have been levelled, and the whole of the ground ploughed over. The lines of the fortifications, broken here and there, are marked by gorse and rubbish. There are, however, some men living who remember these embankments much higher than they are at present ; particularly the innermost agger, which on the seaward side was about ten feet.

There is no vestige of fosse or wall, which were probably filled up with earth when the great levelling process took place, about the latter part of the last century. This earthwork might have been a British fortress erected to repel the northern invaders whom the little creek of Ceibwr might have invited to land on the coast.

Most of the encampments along the coast are by some supposed to have been erected by the Danes, or other invaders, as retreats whither they might betake themselves if, in their raids to the country, they should be worsted by the natives, and where they might keep their booty until they were ready to re-embark for their native homes. But this could not have been the case with Caerau, where the defences were seaward; while the eastern or landward side appears to have been almost defenceless, for the aggers were considerably lower towards the land, and the elevation above the earthwork would give vantage-ground to an enemy approaching from the interior. The outer or lower line of rampart occupied an area of six acres, while the inner or upper line was reduced to one half. Parts of the lower embankment, to the north, may be seen in the hedge cutting the road leading to Moilgrove.

About two hundred yards to the west of Caerau was a square stone building called " Caerau Bach," which might have been an out- post between Caerau and the sea. A little below Caerau Bach were found, about the latter part of the last century, seven urns, of which no description can be given, nor have I been able to ascertain what became of them. A little to the east of Caerau, a ploughman says that many years ago, while ploughing, he discovered a stone, which he supposed to be the keystone of an arch, under which was a hollow, into which he put the handle of his whip, and let it down by the lash to a depth of fifteen feet before finding the bottom. As the man spoke so positively, that he knew the exact spot, I took him there ; and, after spending a great portion of a morning in digging, assisted by a labourer kindly furnished us by the occupier of the farm, no hole was discovered. The ground under the pickaxe gave a hollow sound ; the grass is also unusually rank, and the soil seems to be composed of charred wood and some dark substance not unlike decomposed animal matter. I told the man that if he was inclined to enter into a little speculation, I would give him £1 if he found the spot or nothing. He went there on the following day, but his labours were attended with the like success. I am told there is a gutter about fifteen inches square, somewhere near the spot. This, after the period of thirty-five years, has been probably magnified in the poor man's imagination to so many feet.

In writing a description of Caerau, I am not troubled with embarrassment of matter, for I have never seen a description of it in print or manuscript. Fenton speaks of the monks of Caerau, but he evidently was not there.

He describes several places in the neighbourhood, but takes not the slightest notice of Caerau: indeed, he mistakes Monachlog, on the banks of the Tivy, for Caerau. How he got at the name of Caerau at all, unless it was through George Owen, I have no idea.

Whatever might be said of Caerau, it certainly has not been vulgarized by tourists, who generally keep more inland in travelling through North Pembrokeshire.

Most fortified places in this country have attached to them certain traditions, some bloody battle having been fought at or near the spot ; but Caerau, although rife with traditions, has nothing of the kind. The only invasion of Ceibwr (adjoining Caerau) on record took place upwards of thirty-five years ago. It was a French invasion more disastrous than that of Pencaer some thirty years before, and effected what the first Napoleon with his grand army was never able to do ; for it conquered, within the distance of twenty or thirty miles, a vast number of the British, and kept them in subjection for about five years. The enemy, in this instance, was not a Frenchman, but French brandy, Cherbourg cognac, a contraband trade in which was carried on at Ceibwr.

On the other side of the road leading to Moilgrove is a field called " Waun Caradog"(the Moor of Caractacus), where a fine quern was found. What Caractacus had to do with this spot, I know not. Further on is a field called " Park y ffynnou," from a fine well which it contains, and which probably might have supplied the garrison with water.

My attention has been lately directed to Caerau by a stone coffin enclosure found in the space between the second and third lines of fortification on the east, in what appears to have been an old cemetery extending to the east, north, and south of the earthwork ; which seems to give further proof that the defences were intended against attacks from the sea. In this place, called variously " Llain yr Eglwys," *' Y Fynwent," " Yr Eglwys ddiflodan" (the flowerless Church, — a suitable name for a monastic institution where no ladies were admitted), several graves have been found during the last seventy years. In one of them was a hammer and cutlass ; in another a fragment of bone, which might have been human ; in another the figure T grooved in the mould, and filled up with the scoriae of the Smithy ; and in all, five White pebbles of pure quartz, taken evidently from the sea-shore, of the size of a small apple.

These graves seem to have been all of the same type, from the materials scattered around the field, consisting of fragments of slate, White pebbles, etc. In ploughing the field last spring something White was turned up by the plough, which the ploughman mistook for a piece of lime ; but the lad who drove the plough took it up, and found it to be a human tooth. This led to further examination, and about fourteen inches below the surface they came to a coarse stone coffin of the rudest formation, consisting of five untrimmed slate stones about an inch thick in the middle, and tapering to a thin, jagged edge ; one at the head, two on each side, both of which had two small grey rubble stones at the foot, probably to make out the length. It had neither lid, nor bottom, nor footstone, and gives one the idea of a warrior buried hastily on the battle-field ; but this could hardly have been the case, for the place was evidently a cemetery. This stone inclosure, now covered in, is of the following dimensions : length, six feet seven inches ; width at the widest part, one foot eleven inches ; width at the head and foot, eleven inches ; depth, eleven inches ; lying from north-west to south-east, and probably intended to face the east. How singular that, after the lapse of so many ages, when many a magnificent mausoleum and stately monument have disappeared, this coffin, rudely, flimsily, and hastily got up from materials found at or near the spot, should still remain ! It probably owes its preservation to its insignificance and the isolation of its resting-place. The only thing indicating anything like care was the fine yellow mould with which the coffin was filled, which differed widely from the coarse, stony earth by which it was surrounded. At the head were found a small portion of the skull, which turned to dust the moment it was touched, fifteen small pieces of calcined bone, and eight human teeth (six molars and two canine teeth), in a state of more or less perfection. One of the canine teeth, now in my possession, is covered with enamel, and bears no symptoms of decay except in the root. A medical gentleman thinks that the teeth belonged to a young man about thirty years of age, and that the yellow mould is the decomposed state of the body

How the teeth could have been preserved will ever be a mystery.

There were also found there a piece of crystal and five White pebbles, like those already described. The pieces of bone are, from their contiguity to the teeth, supposed to have been part of the jaw. Of its date I can form no idea. It is certainly not so old as the age attributed to the jaw found in Moulin Quignon in April 1863, supposed to have belonged to a man who existed some thousands of years before Adam (?). Whatever difference there might be between the jawbone with its one molar, found in Moulin Quignon, and the fragments of jaw (if such they be) and the eight teeth found at Caerau, it is certain that the Caerau jaw was not found in a gravel drift on which MM. Quatrefages, Milne-Edwards, Falconer, Prestwitch, Carpenter, etc., can exercise their ingenuity ; but in fine, pure, yellow mould.

It is also evident that it never wagged with the mastodon, breakfasted on beef of the bos hngifrons^dined on hyaena-steaks, or supped on cave-bear, or mistook the crustacean pleiocene or meiocene for lobster-salad, or was acquainted with homo primogenitus ; nor is it certain that it ever heard of the megatheria and the great saurian tribes. But it certainly is not a recent jaw brought from any grave ' to hoax the virtmst.'

The owner of the jaw and teeth might have been a monk, for tradition says that there was once here a monastic establishment; and it is not impossible but that it might be the Religious House of Llandudoch, destroyed by the Danes a.d. 987. In speaking of the monks of Caerau, Fenton describes them as having been located at Monachlog, which is a mistake ; for Monachlog is a cot in the grounds of Pantirion, the seat of R. D. Jenkins, esq., overlooking the Tivy; and the names Pantirion, Tirion, " God's Acre," and Llain yr Arglwydd, on Esgyrn (bones) Land, as well as several monastic remains discovered near the said cot, seem to indicate that there must have been once a religious cell at or near the spot ; but this could not have been Caerau.

We Read nothing of the kings of Caerau, knights of Caerau, or warriors of Caerau ; but we have the monks of Caerau. A monk could fight well at a pinch, and in troublous times a monk not unfrequently exchanged the cowl for the helmet, and his religious vestments for armour of proof. Could the cutlass found in the grave referred to have belonged to a monk ? But surely a fortress could scarcely have been a suitable abode for a company of non-combatants. If the field of Caerau was the site of the Religious House referred to as destroyed by the Danes in the tenth century, could not the monks have subsequently fortified the place against the incursions of the enemy Tradition says that there is a subterranean passage from Caerau to Castell Ion (the Lord's Castle); perhaps another religious fortress, on the Pantisaisou demesne, the property of J. T. W. James, esq., whose ancestors have resided there a vast number of years ; so that when the occupiers of Caerau were driven out of it, they might descend to Castell Ion at the foot of the Hill, and attack the enemy in the rear. If the monks of Caerau were Benedictines, they verified the old Latin distich :

" BeraarduR valles, colles Benedictus amabat ; Oppida Franciscus, magnas Ignatius urbei?";

for they were perched on the brow of a high Hill.Martin, as well as his monks, was a reformed Benedictine (a Bernardite) ; and in bringing (if he did so)the monks of Caerau into his new establishment, he lowered them as to place, if he did not reform them ; at any rate they must have found a great change of climate in the Winter.

There are two cottages on the south side of the earthwork, called Caerau and Penallt Esgob (the top of the Bishop's Hill). This I merely mention to shew that Caerau had something ecclesiastical about it. Near these cottages, on the south-east, was, within the memory of men now living, a wall of very superior masonry, about thirty feet Long and nine feet high, which might have been a part of the Monastery of Caerau.

Caerau is situate in the hamlet of Pantygroes (the valley of the cross). Where the cross was, it is difficult to say, unless it was at the cross-road hard by, called " Bwlch Pant y Groes," where a lady in White was formerly seen at the witching hour of midnight, though it is said that Bwlch Pant y Groes is comparatively a modern name, and given to it when the new road was formed, the place before having been called " let Llain Rowland." There must, however, have been a cross somewhere. Croes Bigog, where funerals coming from that part of the parish used formerly to stop, because, according to tradition, there the Abbey Cross first came to view (?) — a more probable reason for this custom is, that it was once the site of a way-side cross — is in the hamlet of Abbey.

In the road near Caerau, and opposite the second embankment, is a hollow which rings when any wheeled vehicle goes over it. About eighty years ago two men had the curiosity to dig there, and they solemnly declared that they came to the frame of a doorway ; but when they went to dinner, the rain descended, accompanied by thunder and lightning, and on their return the whole was closed, as they supposed by super natural agency. A little above the place where they had been digging they affirmed that there had been no rain.

At Castell Ion some stairs were seen, supposed to lead to some passage. A farmer's wife, about ninety years since, having risen very early one morning, was thus accosted by a woman bearing the semblance of a gipsy, " Would you like to take your rest of a morning instead of leaving your bed so early ? " "Yes," was the reply. Then said the woman, " If you dig in a certain spot in the subterranean passage between Caerau and Castell Ion, you will find what will make you the richest lady in the land."

About sixty years ago a respectable man declared that he was cutting a hedge between Trefas and Pant y Groes when a grey-headed old man came to him, and told him that there was an underground way from Caerau to Pentre Evan ; and that if he excavated a certain place he would find two hundred " murk" (? marks).

A woman once appeared to a ploughboy, and told him that there were ten murk under the threshold of Caerau Bach. When the cottage, which had been probably built on the site of the outpost referred to, was taken down, a number of people assembled to search for the marks, but none were found.

Tradition gives Castell Ion a different derivation to the one given by me. It is said to have been the abode of one Ioan ; but whether he was a saint or sinner is not known. On one occasion it is said that, when pursued by the enemy, he crossed the stream, and left the impression of the hoof of his charger on a stone, which has something like the Mark of a horse's shoe upon it.

Probably these traditions might be the ingenious produce of a tump hard by, called " Cnwc y Celwydd" (the tump of lies), where men and women were formerly in the habit of assembling on the Lord's Day in large masses, to disport themselves by inventing and telling the most lying and wonderful tales that their imagination could devise. Though this practice has been happily discontinued, and people now betake themselves to their respective places of worship, yet it is to be feared that falsehood has not yet left the neighbourhood : indeed, it would have been well for this village if the "father of lies" had left it, and travelled so far to the extremity of the parish as Cnwc y Celwydi But, alas! such is not the case.

The old chronicler of Caerau, who used to say that he had been baptized by a vicar of St. Dogmells (dead since 1768), and who had spent almost all his lifetime on the farm of Penallt Ceibwr, was alive a few months ago. He told me that the whole neighbourhood was considered " fou." That men were led astray there all night, not knowing whither they went, until cockcrowing, when they discovered that they were not far from home. A man carrying a bundle of hoop-rods, in one of these midnight wanderings, dropped them one by one to ascertain the extent of his journey ; and when he went after them in the morning, he found he had travelled an incredible number of miles. A St. Dogmells' fisherman having been at a wedding at Moilgrove, lost his bearings on his way home at night, and was for some hours not able to find his course, until at last he fortunately discovered the north pole, by which he sailed homewards. Some of these might have been under the influence of Tam O'Shanter's guide

This, however, cannot be said of them all ; for an old clerical friend of mine, of sober habits, had once the honour of joining in this magic dance for the great part of a night. All the laud round about Caerau was once open and unenclosed, which may account, in some measure, for these vagaries. When a man in the dark loses every idea of the terminus a quo he is not likely to arrive speedily at the terminus ad quern. A person in this parish told me that he one night heard groaning in the field where the lady used to appear, which frightened him so much that he was ill for several days. Could the groans have been caused by the disappearance of the lady, who, I believe, has not been seen for many years ?

Let us now examine the surroundings of Caerau.

About a mile to the right is Hendre, where there was once, no doubt, a fine mansion belonging to the Lloyd s, who, like the Bowen s of Llwyngwair, etc., were descendants of Gwynfardd and Cwhelyn, who might have founded the Monastery of Caerau ; for they had ever been great benefactors to the Church, particularly Arcol Llaw Hir, whose grants are recorded in Liber Landavensis. The pedigree of the Lloyd s is inserted in Lewis Dwnn. The founder of this family was Fylip Lloyd of Hendref. Ieuan Lloyd , gentleman, married Mari, daughter of George Owen, esq., Lord of Kemes in 1613. Alban Lloyd married Elin, daughter of Sir John Perrot. A branch of this family lived at Trevigin for many generations, as appears by the evidence produced in the great Selby cause. Some of them must have built the old Church of Monington, which bore greater marks of antiquity than any Church in this neighbourhood. A description of it, as well as some particulars connected with St. Dogmells, may be given in a future paper.

The Lloyd s, after residing at Hendre for a vast number of years, removed to Cwmglybyn, where the male line became extinct by the death of Thomas Lloyd , esq.. The female line is now represented by M. W, I A. Owen, esq., of Cwmgloyn. " To William Lloyd , one of the family," writes Fenton, there was an indulgence granted by Pope Eugenius, a.d. 1442, 14th November, at the city of Florence, to have " altare portabile ad missas et alia divina officia etiam ante diem et in locis interdictis celebranda."

John Lloyd of Hendre was sheriff of Pembrokeshire in 1623.

A part of the old house, and what was probably an oratory attached thereto, have been converted into a cowhouse. The keystone of the arch of the doorway of the dwelling house is thus inscribed, t. ll. esq.. 1744.

The supposed oratory has no entrance from without. The door on the north-west, leading to it from the dwelling house, is not dissimilar to the door of what used to be called the Refectory in the Abbey of St. Dogmael's. On the south-west once stood an image, which was taken down when an opening was made in the wall at a place where the said image had Long remained. It was exhibited at the Cardigan Arch. Meeting in 1859, and is now at Clynfiew, the seat of Major Lewis, the proprietor of Hendre. As it has been unfortunately removed from its original position, it is well that it is in a place where it will be properly taken care of, which would scarcely be the case if it had been permitted to rest loosely against the wall at Hendre. In the east was a small window, the size of which may now be traced. It was probably a doublet, its breadth being much greater than its length. The walls of this building are very strong, and partly built of sea-pebbles embedded in very hard mortar. It is 19 feet Long, 15 feet 7 inches wide, 9 feet high ; and, whatever it might have been, it certainly has the appearance of having been once a place devoted to religious worship.

In front of Caerau, on the right, is Castell TreRees, and on the left Castell Treriffith, both of which appear to have been strong Danish encampments. Here, were it not from a fear of overstepping strictly archsgeological bounds, I might dilate on the unrivalled rock-scenery of Ceibwr (cae bwr, enclosed fortress), the medicinal Properties of Alum Well, the curious configuration of Pwll y Wrach, the Witch's Cave, and the booming reverberation of the sea within it during a storm, illustrating the well-known Homeric phrase to perfection ; and the precipitous crags of Treriffith Castle, which George Owen considered as resembling Tintagel Castle in Cornwall, associated with the memory of King Arthur.

To the left is Pant y Groes, in the parish of Moilgrove, — so called from having been once the site of the cross now at Treprisk, an illustration of which appeared in the Arch. Camb. some time ago. A little further on is Tregaman, on the brook Coman, the birthplace of Maud Peveril, wife of Robert Fitzmartin, who, in the language of the charter, "with the approbation, or rather by the exhortation of my wife Matilda," largely endowed the Abbey of St. Dogmael's. A little beyond Tregaman is Treicert and Trewrdan, — so called from their owners, Ricart and Jordan, sons of Lucas de Hoda, a favourite of Martin de Tours. Ricart married {temp. Hen. III) Nesta, daughter and heir of Llewelyn ap Rhydderck, a younger son of the Prince of South Wales. Philip ap Ricart married Alice, daughter and heir of Sir Nicholas Martin, Lord of Cemaes, from whom, through Geo. Owen, Sir Thomas Lloyd, Bart, of Bronwydd, claims descent.

A little to the right is Trelyffaint,— so called, says Giraldus, " from a man of the name of Syssyllt Escir hir Syssyllt tyhid hngd Syssyllt, Longshanks having been there devoured by toads," a story worthy of Giraldus. In the parlour of the house, over the chimney-piece, in the centre of a pretty landscape of the place, painted on wood, was formerly a dark marble toad, said to be sent from Italy by Sir Richard Mason, Knight of the Green Cloth to James 11, to his relatives at Trelyffaint in Pembrokeshire, who bore a toad for their crest. It was exhibited at the Cardigan Arch. Meeting, and is now in the possession of Mrs. Owen of Cwmgloyn.

Not far off is Coedwynog, of which honourable mention is made by George Owen ; and in the neighbourhood is Tredrysey, once inhabited by a Norman of the name of Cole, who is said to have first discovered marl at Llwyngwair, where he was first located. Marl was once plentiful in North Pembrokeshire, and extensively used for manure, as the old marl-pits prove. Llwyngwair has Long been the residence of the Bowen s, one of the oldest families in Pembrokeshire, represented by James B. Bowen, esq..

All these places are on the old road from the Abbey of St. Dogmael's through Bwlch y Nhyfer, above the village of St. Dogmells, by Monington, Rhyd y Vantwn, to Nevern, en route to St Davids. A little to the left of this road is Feidr Saint (the lane of the saints) ; probably another way of the pilgrims from Strata Florida, by Nevern, to Menevia.

A field or two to the right, on the farm of Tregaman referred to, is Llech y Dribedd, or Tripod Stone, supported by three stones. Another stone, which now lies on the ground, was once upright, and placed under the covering stone, but did not touch it in the time of Edw. Lluyd. Length of the covering stone, 9 feet 4 inches ; width, 8 feet ; thickness, from 4 to 5 feet on the south side, and tapering to about 4 inches on the north. Height of south supporter, 4 feet 4 inches ; ditto, north supporter, 3 feet 6 inches. Horizontal circumference of covering stone, 35 feet ; vertical, 23 feet. Though it bears no comparison to that of Pentre Evan in length, width, and particularly in height (being scarcely, in the centre, two feet from the ground), yet it is considerably thicker ; indeed, it scarcely deserves the name of " llech,"* being more round than flat, and nearly oval. I know of no other of the like configuration. At a distance it appears like an immense boulder, nearly touching the ground. It does not possess what has been considered one of the distinctive marks of a cromlech, being quite as rough and rugged within as it is without. It is composed of crystalline slate, and has been used as a whet-stone, as is evident from the indentations in some of the Angles ; but I should think that those who attempted to sharpen their knives upon it, must have met with the same success as those learned savans who have been sharpening their wits to discover the purpose for which it had been erected. It is too hard for a hone, though not quite impervious to an edged tool, as appears from the thousand and one initials carved upon it by rustics, who from age to age have thus endeavoured to immortalize their names. Taken altogether, it is certainly a most interesting object, occupying, like its neighbour of Pentre Evan, a very elevated spot, which commands a widely extended prospect.

" There is," says Edward Lluyd in Gibson's edition of Camden *' in Nevern parish a monument commonly called ' Llech y Dribedd,' e.g., tripodium ; and by some, the Altar Stone. It is somewhat of an oval form, and about twelve yards in circumference, and placed on four stones (whereof one is useless, as not touching it), scarce two foot high. At the south it is about four foot and a half in thickness; but sensibly thinner to the end, where it exceeds not four inches ; at which end there is cut such a ductus or conveyance as might serve to carry off any liquid that should run down ; but to what purpose it was designed, I shall not pretend to conjecture." This stone has been sketched by Sir Richard Hoare, and forms a pretty vignette in the title-Page of Fenton's Historical Tour. The worthy baronet has been accused of misrepresenting the stone as dipping south-east instead of north-west, as it actually does : indeed, something to that effect has been inscribed on the covering stone. Now the stone in the picture appears to me as not dipping to any of the points of the compass, but that the dipping depended on the stand-point from which the sketch was taken.

On the Newport road, at the junction of two ways leading respectively to Berry and Newport Sands, in a place called Feidr y Beddau (the lane of graves), were formerly small tumuli containing vestiges of graves, about which I could find no satisfactory information.

The old town of Tref Draeth (the town on the sands) was, according to tradition, like another Peranzabuloe, swallowed by the sands. Some slight remains of it are said to be occasionally discovered after a storm ; but this is merely a supposition.

A propos of earthworks, with which I commenced this paper, two more remain to be mentioned. At the other end of the parish, about two miles and a half from Cardigan, to the right of the road leading to the Narberth road Station, is Nant Brychellan, or Nant Berchellan, marked " Castell" in the Ordnance Map. It is precipitous on all sides ; but perhaps less so on the south, where is situate the old farm-house of Nant Brychellan in a most picturesque spot, bearing marks of great antiquity, and having its gRoundfloor carved in the solid rock, like that of Cronllwyn, where Martin de Tours first unfurled his standard when he undertook the conquest of Cemaes. Near it is a fine spring, from which flows a small brook which has probably given its name to the place.

Nant Brychellan was surrounded by a fosse and a wall, which were levelled about the beginning of this century, and covered about an acre and a half of ground, which is said to be now the most productive portion of the farm. A broken sword and some other relics have been found there from time to time.

Adjoining this farm is Pentood (? sand head). The first syllable in Nant Brychellan signifies " a brook," while the two last are of doubtful interpretation. It is singular that the two farms are the property of a family of the name of Sambrook (sand brook), where they have lived for a vast number of years. Sambrook is one of the oldest names in the parochial records of this parish.

A little this side of Llantood Church, in the said parish, and two fields to the left of the road from Cardigan to Haverfordwest, from which former place it is distant about two miles and a half, is Castell Penallt Llantood, pRoudly overlooking the Valle of Cwm Gaer. Though not so large nor so curious as Caerau, it is much more perfect : indeed, I know of no other so perfect in North Pembrokeshire. It is surrounded by a deep fosse, and an agger of earth ten, and in some places twelve feet high, and is covered with a fine plantation, which gives it from below a grand and lordly appearance. It has a fine well on the east, and on the south are the remains of an old stone tower about thirty feet in diameter. This, like Nant Brychellan, is marked " Castell" in the Ordnance Map.

Of the date of these two earthworks, and the purpose for which they were raised, nothing satisfactory can be advanced. A free discussion of the subject would be most desirable. There are places of defence on the Tivy which can be more fairly accounted for. Old Castle was probably a Danish encampment; and the spot now covered by the Coedmore flower-garden might have been an outpost to Cilgerran Castle, as well as the mound near Llechrhyd. Castle Maelgwyn is recorded in history. But my business in this paper has been chiefly with places to which no historic records are attached, or at least none that I am acquainted with ; and for which, if there be any, I shall be very thankful.

Mining – Copper

Copper ore reported discovered in 1851 – possibly worked but exact location of Mining not known

Sites of Interest

Crugiau Maen Saeson

Two circular mounds on opposite sides of the high road about half a mile east of Maen Saenson farm house which have been almost entirely removed. The larger and more southerly of the two has a base circumference of about 300ft. The lesser mound is about 170 ft in circumference with a height of 3 ft. both cairns are largely covered with gorse, but small White stones can be detected in their remains. They command a wide viiew of the Teifi estuary – visited 10th June 1914 RCAM

Penrallt yr Esgob cairn

This is a circular grass grown mound on Penrallt yr Esgob Farm, 300yds north east of the village of Moylgrove. It is about 250 ft in circumference and 5ft in height. It exhibits no signs of disturbance –visited 10th June 1914 RCAM

Castel

A promontory fort immediately above Ceibwr Bay, in the south west of the parish. It is defended on the land side bt a single rampart and ditch. The area thus cut off measures 165 ft ny 150ft (a little above ½ an acre.; The surface is fairly level. The rampart is well preserved; it has a length of 120ft, rises 6ft and falls 9ft to an aouter ditch 10ft in width, and counterscarp of 6ft. The entrance at the south end of the bank has been altered. It may have had a width of 15ft visited 11th June 1914 RCAM.

Caerau

(See also article by H J Vincent – Caeran) for a discription of the earthworks in his day)

This is a circular enclosure 360 ft in diameter, originally defended by three banks; to the north and east thease have been levelled by cultivation, but their outlines are still traceable. To the south and west they have been better preserved, though much cultivated down. The innermost line of defence rises 2ft and falls 3ft' the intermediate bank has an average rise of 3ft with a fall of 4ft; the outermost rises 2ft and falls 4ft to the level. The width between the three lines averages 60ft . Any ditches which may have formed part of the original work have been filled up. The entrance is to the southwest; it appears to have been a direct cut 30ft wide through the three banks. visited 10th June 1914 RCAM

Y Felin;The Mill, St Dogmaels

Y Felin, a traditional stone-built water-powered corn mill, dates from at least the 1640s but may be associated with the adjacent Abbey and may thus be earlier. A third storey was added to the mill in the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century, with new machinery installed 1820-1825. The mill worked until 1926, reopening briefly during the second World War; it was restored from 1980 and is currently operational commercially and open to the public. The overshot waterwheel incorporates cast-iron shrouds from St David's mill (Felin Fach or Dewiston Mill, St David's), but set on the original axle and cast-iron hubs which date from about 1860 (Thomas and Co. Cardigan). The original wheel was retrieved and installed at Y Felin, Tynygraig. There are three pairs of stones and a bolter; an intact oat drying kiln is in lean-to building.

ST DOGWELLS St Dogfael SM 968279

The 16th century aisle has two arches towards each of the nave and chancel, which are both 13th century. The Strand family arms appear on the easternmost arch, the eastern part of the aisle being their Chapel. There is a double bellcote.

This benefice appears to have belonged to the Bishop of St Davids at a very early date.

A Statue of Bishop Reginald de Brian in 1352 states that Bishop Gervase [who held the bishopric from 1215 till 1230] granted the Church of St. Dogmael de LlanlleDewy [i.e. St- Dog-wells in Pebydiog, or Dewisland] to the Canons of St Davids - a grant which was confirmed by Bishop Thomas Wallensis and also by his successor, Bishop Richard Cerrew, in 1219, the Church in each case being called St-Dogmael in Pebydyauk. - Stat. Minevia.

Prior to, and at the date of the grant to the Canons by Bishop Gervase, the benefice of St. Dogwells was a rectory, and the grant in question was to take effect after the cession or death of Master Roger, who was then rector. This is the only record of an individual rector of this Church, the rectorship being subsequently vested in the Canons.

The Church of St. Dogwells was in 1291 assessed at £10 for tenths to the King, the sum payable being £1. - Taxatio.

The tithes of St. Dogwells were leased on 26 July, 1580, to Thomas Edwards of the city of St Davids, gent., for 21 years, at a rent of £3 6s. 8d.

On 26 July, 1717, they were leased to John Edwards, esq., for 21 years, at the same rent, and in 1731 another lease at the same rent and for a similar term was granted to John Edwards of Trefgarn, in the parish of St Dogwells, esq.,

who was the ancestor of the Edwardess of Sealyham. -Chapter Records.

The parish of St. Dogwells was united with that of Little Newcastle by an Order in Council, dated 13 Jan, 1845.

On 17 March , 1906, a facility was granted for putting up a window in the chancel of St. Dogwells Church.

1811 Fenton St Dogwells

Hence the road takes me to the village of St Dogwells, or as in Welsh it is called Llantý Dewi, a vicarage in the presentation of the chapter of St David's to which it was appropriated, A.D. 1254 by Bishop Thomas Wallensis, the rectorial tithes being now held by lease under that body, as well as the manor of St Dogwells granted to them by Sir Richard Symond, Knight, A.D.1329, for the maintenance of two priests in the cathedral of St David's to say mass for his soul and that of Eleanor his wife.

The Church consists of a nave, chancel, and south aisle, separated by low Saxon arches on clumsy round pillars, with plain capitals. At the east end of the south aisle, and on the south side of it, there is a plain stone canopy, which I presume might have once covered an effigy, probably that of Sir Richard Symond, a recorded benefactor of the Church,(This Richard Symond was at first a priest, and confidential chaplain to John de Barry, who styles himself Lord of Manorbeer; but in a deed from him to Richard Symond of his manor of St Dogwells, he grants it “dilecto et fideli clerico suo, nunc militi” so that he appears to have abandoned his original profession and have taken to arms. The deed is dated 5th July, fifth of Edward the First.--Stat Menev.) who is supposed to have settled here, and to have laid the foundation of the Symmons' family, ever afterwards centring in that vicinity. On the floor, just opposite, is a gravestone, with a well sculptured cross Fleury on it, and on the south wall a handsome monument to the family of Tucker, of Sealyham, whose elegant mansion and beautiful grounds, finely wooded, occupy the slope of the opposite Hill and banks of the Sealy. The Church has no tower or other decoration, and wants, like most of the churches of this country, more frequent ventilation, otherwise it is kept with great neatness, and most charmingly situated on a gentle rising in the midst of young thriving plantations overhanging the romantic mountain stream that rushes below it. On entering the village of St Dogwells, being much struck with the singular appearance of a mass of rock at the end of the range of wood to the east of the house of Sealyham on the opposite side, much resembling the truncated ruins of an old Castle, and having crossed the river I turned to the right to examine it, where I found a circular entrenchment, involving those rocks which had attracted my attention, called Castell Coning, a corruption perhaps of Cynan, seemingly from its position a most important link of that chain of posts extending the whole length of the northern boundary of this river. In a ledge of this broken mass of rocks, a great way from the ground, there occurred a maen sigyl, or rocking stone, of about three ton weight.

Wolf's Castle

Passing the mansion of Sealyham, I follow the ridge of the Hill at the back of the woods embosom it, and reach Wolf's Castle, a small village , so denominated from having one of those large tomens close to it, so placed as to command the embouchure of the Sealy at its junction with the Cleddau, and the much frequented Ford over it, called in old writings (but why I could never learn) Gibbrick's Ford. Here I fall in with the main road.

Dogwell's, St. (St. Dogfael) 1839 Lewis

a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dewisland, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 9 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, on the road from that town to Fishguard; containing 461 inhabitants. This parish is noted, on traditional authority, as the birthplace and place of burial of Owain Glyndwr, who is said to have been born at Little Trêvgarn, and to have been interred at the small village of Wolf's Castle, both situated within its limits. The manor of St. Dogwell's was granted to the upper chapter of St Davids by Sir Richard Symmond, Knt., in 1328, for the maintenance of two priests in the cathedral Church of that place, to say mass for the benefit of his soul and that of his wife: the rectorial tithes of the parish had been given to the same body by Bishop Thomas Wallensis, in the year 1254. Little Trêvgarn was annexed by Bishop Iorwerth to the precentorship in the cathedral of St Davids, on the foundation of that dignity, but was subsequently resumed by Bishop Gower, and an annual stipend of twenty marks allowed in its stead. It does not appear at what time it was re-appropriated, but it is now held on lease of the precentor, or rather of the body to which the income of the precentorship has just passed, by William Edwardess Tucker, esq., of Sealy-Ham, as representative of the Edwardess family of Little Trêvgarn, in which it has been vested for upwards of 200 years. Sealy-Ham is an elegant modernised mansion on the bank of a small stream, called the Sealy, and has been in the possession of the same family since the reign of Edward III.: it is now the property and residence of W. E. Tucker, esq., by marriage of John Owen Edwardess, esq., of Little Trêvgarn, with the heiress of that house.

Slate Quarry

Slate of good quality is worked upon a limited Scale.

The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the King's Books at £4. 16. 0½.; patrons, the Bishop and the Dean and Chapter of St Davids. The impropriate tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £84. 8., and the vicarial tithes for one of £43. 10. 8.: the vicar's glebe comprises fifty-two acres and a half, valued at £50 per annum; and there is a glebe-house. The Church, dedicated to St. Dogvael, is a plain building of considerable antiquity, without either tower or spire; the nave is separated from the south aisle by low Norman arches. The sum of £6. 10. per annum was left to the poor of the parish, and £1 to the minister for a sermon on Easter Monday, under the will of John Edwardess, esq., of Trêvgarn, in 1738. The former amount is paid to the master of a British school at Wolf's Castle, erected in 1834, and situate on elevated ground, near the road from Haverfordwest to Fishguard. In the parish are a cromlech, and other remains of antiquity, some of which, supposed to have been Druidical altars, are at present little more than an indiscriminate heap of stones. There are also slight remains of three ancient encampments, probably of Danish origin, and in a more perfect state than the relics above mentioned; of these, one, near which are three tumuli, is situated at Wolf's Castle, and the two others, within one of which is a rocking-stone, are in the demesne of Sealy-Ham

1870-72, John Marius Wilson's Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales described St Dogwells like this:

DOGWELLS (St.), a parish in Haverfordwest district, Pembroke; on an affluent of the west Cleddau river, 7 miles NW by N of Clarbeston road r. station, and 8 N of Haverfordwest. Post town, Llanychaer, under Haverfordwest. Acres, 3, 347. Real property, £2, 345. Pop., 436. Houses, 83. The property is divided among a few. The manor belongs to St Davids cathedral. Slate is quarried, and a medicinal spring occurs. The living is a vicarage in the diocese of St Davids. Value, £71.* Patrons, the Bishop, and Dean, and Chapter of St Davids. The Church is good. Charities, £8.

The Parish Church dedicated to St Dogwell. RCAM

The Church now consists of chancel 16 ½ ft by 15 ½ ft, nave 31ft by 15ft, south aisle 41 ½ ft by 9 ½ ft, a south porch, and a plain double Bell cote above the west gable. It is clear that the original building of the late 13th century was enlarged about the end of the 14th or beginning of the 15th century by the addition of a south aisle, which was carried from a line level with the existing east wall to within about 7ft of the west front. The aisle was connected with the main chamber by two narrow arches from the chancel, and two wider arches from the nave. The eastern bay of the aisle was doubtless intended for a mortuary Chapel; either side of the arch bears a shield , probably of a Symond. The font is of the plain Norman cushion type –visited 13th August 1915.

Inscribed Stone

In the churchyard is an early Latin and Ogam inscribed stone, formerly used as a gatepost. The Latin reads HOGTIVIS FILI DEMETI ; The ogam consists of one name only, which seems to be OGTENLO or OGTENLAS; the latter reading was suggested by Professor R.A. F. Macalister in 1921.

Wolf Castle British school

This school house was erected in 1834 at the expense of Wm Edwardess esq., of Sealyham, with the aid of a parliament grant of £170 and the carriage of some materials by local farmers. It is built on elevated ground, near the road leading from Haverfordwest to Fishguard. There is a schoolroom for boys , and another for girls (the latter is not used not having been completed.) and a house for the master in the middle. The floor is not in good repair, but materials have been purchased for the purpose of repairing it. The late John Edwards esq., of Trogan, left £6 5s a year for the poor of the parish in 1647 and within these last few years that sum has been appropriated to pay the master for teaching 14 poor boys. The furniture consists of a master's desk, 10 desks and benches attached, spelling, reading and arithmetical lessons of the British and Foreign School Society; maps of Scotland, Ireland, England, and Wales, Europe, Asia. Africa. North America, South America, and a new chart of the world in good condition.

The master was highly spoken of by many with whom I conversed, but the school is not so flourishing as it was some years ago. Farmers, mechanics and labourers children are taught in it. The school was closed for the holidays. The few copybooks I saw were well written January 14th Wm Morris Assistant..

Lower broad Moor Stone RCAM

Standing on a field known as Gwerglody y garreg belonging to Lower broad Moor farmstead, is an erected stone which has every appearance of being a prehistorical monument. The stone is somewhat pointed, 92in high and a girth of 14ft at base. Facing northwards it is 60in wide southward 80in. It is known locally as the Lower broad Moor Stone; no traditions are associated with it – visited 19th August 1915.

Sealyham Camps

1] An earthwork which has suffered much from quarrying operations immediately to the south of it. The defence consists of a semicircular rampart 450ft long and a ditch 5ft broad and 4ft deep. The present entrance at the north-east end of the rampart is modern; the original probably disappeared in a fall of soil to the road below. The field on which the earthwork stands is known as Castle Park – visited 19th August 1915.

2] A work now much ruined standing on a field known as Parc y garn. Locally the camp is known as Y Garn. Lieut -Colonel W. Ll. Morgan R.E. a former Commissioner, speaking of its appearance some years ago, observes: “A very uncertain work; it might well have been made by Iron Age men. At the same time, at any age, it would probably have been chosen for a defensive position. It is an irregular parallelogram 80yds by 50 yds on a rocky knoll on the right bank of the river Anghof. The defence is greatly assisted by rocks and two large tors at the north east and south west corners; between these is a low bank with traces of a ditch only on the eastern side. To the west the bank is 4ft high, with the same fall to the natural ground, there is no ditch visible at the present time. The general appearance of the work is in favour of the Iron Age. visited 13th August 1915. NB According to Fenton p339 this work was called “Castell Coning, perhaps a corruption of Cynan”

Wolf's Castle

This prominent mound Castle stands on a bluff at the junction of the western Cleddeau and the Anghof rivers. The mound rises some 20ft from the level; its summit 50ft in diameter, it has been disturbed in living memory. The surrounding ditch is shallow. To the north of the ditch is a platform, 20ft in length which served as the Bailey, and whence access to the Castle was gained. The field on which the mound stands is known as Castle Park. On the 6in Ord sheet the work is marked “Tumulus” – visited 2nd August 1915.

Parc y garn

Our Inspector was informed that on this field there formerly stood a flat stone about 8ft high and 30 feet in diameter, which has been broken up for road metal.

A small meadow about 500 yards south of the above field is termed Parc y Garreg.

Parc y Garreg

On the field east of Swm bach Cottage is a stone of irregular form 2ft 10in in height and 3ft 10in in girth –visited 13th August 1915.

Trefgarn Wood Camps

[1]A semicircular work in Little Trefgarn Wood about 50yds north of Gorgan Pool of the western Cleddau. It is not marked on the 6in sheet. The bank faces north east with its open side to the river. The rampart has a length of 250ft rises 5ft and falls 7ft to a ditch apparently about 10ft wide, now almost silted up – visited 10th August 1915.

[2]A circular enclosure about 500yds south of the former. A rough earth and stone rampart, much ruined to the north, has an average rise of 2ft and a fall of 5ft to a ditch, and encloses an area 120ft in diameter. The ditch has almost disappeared. The entrance to the north east had a width of about 20ft. Quern stones, more or less perfect, have been found here --visited 10th August 1915.

[3]An earthwork about 50 yds south of [2] roughly rectangular in shape, the defence consists of a slightly curved rampart and ditch to the north; the area cut off overlooks the Spittal brook to the south and east. On the west the rampart rises 5ft and falls 12ft to a ditch with a width of 15ft. The entrance may have been 20ft wide; it appears to have been placed at the west end of the rampart. There was a low bank along the edge of the precipice. The surface is densely covered with undergrowth. --visited 10th August 1915.

[4] About 400yds north of [1] is a circular earthwork having an area of about 180ft across. The rampart has a rise of 7ft and a fall of 5ft to a ditch, now practically filled in. The ground slopes sharply to the western Cleddau. The entrance which seems to have been at the south east is ruined – visited 10th August 1915.

[5] About 200 yds north of [4] is a circular enclosure with a diameter of 75ft; the rampart is now only about 2ft high with a fall to a shallow ditch. Possibly the entrance was to the north east. The purpose of the work is doubtful –visited 10th August 1915.

Finds

Querns A perfect upper stone (16in in diameter , 3 in thick) with a hole for handle on the edge; half of an upper stone (13 in. in diameter and 5in. Thick); and a fragment of an upper stone (10in. In diameter) ; all said to have been found in the Hazel Grove Camp [2] were seen by our Inspecting Officer in the parish on 10th August 1915.

St Edrins

Edren's, St. (St. Edryn)1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis a parish, in the poor-law union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dewisland, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 10 miles (N. N. W.) from Haverfordwest; containing 182 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very small extent, is for the most part inclosed and cultivated. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant; net income, £85. It is now in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor, having been exchanged by the Dean and Chapter of St Davids, for the living of St. Elvis', under a clause in a recent act, which allows the exchange or union of small livings for the purpose of making a better provision for the Clergy. The impropriation remains with the Chapter as before. There is a place of worship for Baptists, with a Sunday school held in it. The grass in the churchyard is asserted by many persons to be a specific for preserving both men and cattle from the effects of the bite of a mad dog: it is the perquisite of the parish clerk, by the sufferance of the incumbent.

Pembrokeshire Parsons

Church now in private hands stands in a prehistoric henge (earthen ring) reached by “corpse roads”. Grass from Churchyard formerly used as a cure for mad dog bites.

There is little doubt, as the editor of Owen's Pem. points out, that the Church of St. Edrens is the Ecclesia de Treffdyauc mentioned in the Taxatio as having been assessed in 1291 at £3 6s. 8d. for tenths to the King, the amount payable being 6s. 8d. This Church is evidently the same benefice, which is called Trefnok in a statute of Bishop Reginald de Brian, and is therein stated to have been granted by Robert, son of Elyder, to the cathedral and Canons of St Davids - a gift which in 1278 Bishop Richard Carew confirmed to the Canons. - Stat. Menev.

There appears to be no mention of this benefice in the Valor Eccl. In 1594 it was a curacy in the patronage of the Canons of St Davids Cathedral. - Owen's Pem.

Under the heading “Not in Charge”:- St. Edrens alias St. Edrins Cur. Church of St Davids. £4 certified value. - Bacon's Liber Regis.

An Order in Council was issued on 14 September., 1841, approving of the exchange of the patronage of the perpetual curacy of St. Edrens (owned by the dean and chapter of St Davids Cathedral) for that of the rectory of St. Elvis, owned by the King.

On 19 Aug., 1907, a faculty was granted for the replacement of the floor of the sanctuary with tiles, and to provide new altar rails in the parish Church.

Canon Payn, in his MS. called Collectanea Meneuensis, records a curious old tradition, which still remains in the memory of old persons, in connection with this Church. The grass in the churchyard, he says, is in great esteem on account of its efficacy and wonderful effects in curing people, cattle, horses, sheep, and pigs, which have been bitten by mad dogs. The people cut the grass with a knife and eat it with Bread and butter the cattle are turned in to graze; and no symptoms of madness have ever afterwards appeared, provided they would eat some quantity of the grass; but there have been some instances where horses and sheep would not graze in the churchyard and which died in a short time afterwards. This account is attested by persons of veracity resident in the neighbourhood. This account was given in 1811 by the Rev. John Jenkins, the vicar, [of St. Dogwells] but instances occurred in the time of Mr. Meyler, the vicar in 1840-1876, when persons came to the churchyard to eat the grass. Mr. Jenkins also stated in 1811 that there was a cavity in the chancel wall of the Church, in which the persons put what they chose to pay for the grass, and these gifts were the perquisite of the parish clerk.

The earliest mention of the renting of this benefice among the records of St Davids Chapter is in the account of William Waryn, the communitius for 1490, which shows that the tenant in that year was Magister William ap Howell, the rent paid being 40s. On 26 July, 1615, George Bird of Coventry was granted a lease of the benefice for 21 years at the annual rent of £2 13s. 4d. In July, 1629, Nicholas Binks, clerk, one of the vicars choral of the cathedral, obtained a lease for 21 years at the same rent, but in 1660, when a lease for 21 years was granted to Thomas Philipps of Lampeter Velfrey, the rent was raised to £5 6s. 8d. In July, 1670, Richard Philipps of Haverfordwest obtained a lease for 21 years at the same rent, and in July, 1697, Philip Philipps of Lampeter Velfrey was granted a lease for a similar term at the same rent, but in addition had to pay the stipend of a curate to serve the Church. In July, 1733, the rectory of St. Edrens was leased for 21 years to Thomas Philipps of the parish of Lampeter Velfrey, gent., at the yearly rent of £11 6s. 8d and in July, 1768, a lease was granted for the same term to Phillipps Philipps of Lampeter Velfrey at £5 6s.8d rent and a stipend of £5 to the curate and a fine of £15 15s. In July, 1794, a lease for the same period and on the same conditions was granted to Thomas Philipps of Jeffreyston, esq., the fine paid on this occasion being £21, this lease was renewed in July, 1801, by the same tenant for 21 years at the same rent, but the fine was £37. This last lease seems to have come into the possession of Rebecca Williams of the parish of St. Thomas , Haverfordwest, who in July 1809, was granted a new lease for 21 years on the surrender of the lease of 1801, the same rent being reserved but the fine being £88.

The Parish Church dedicated to Edren RCAM

The present structure , consisting of chancel, nave, and western tower, was erected in the year 1846; all the fittings are of that date. The early font, once formed part of a stile on the north side of the churchyard, has recently been brought into the Church. The bowl, now much damaged, is octagonal in shape, with an external diameter of 28 in.; the base, 28in. Square, seems to have supported an octagonal shaft, now missing. Both the bowl and the base are of the purple Cae Bwddi stone.

Carved and Incised Crosses

Affixed to the chancel walls are two much weathered crosses and a fragment of a third; and erected in the churchyard on the north side of the building is a fourth. The most interesting of the group is that affixed to the north wall of the chancel. A plain rectangular slab, 23 in. by 10in., bears a plain Latin cross in relief, and in the upper Angles of the cross arms are inscribed the Greek signs for Alpha and Omega; the lower Angles have the letters I H C on the right and X P C on the left; both inscriptions extend down each side of the limb, whilst the remainder of the space is occupied by plain panels. By its side is a fragment of a cylindrical pillar, 13in. long 8in wide. This bears incised lines, and the stone is doubtless the lower part of a plain Latin cross. On the south wall is a stone 26in by 14in., in shape an ellipse and rounded at the top, which bears in relief a plain Latin Cross in a circle uniting the four limbs, all of the terminals being carried below the circle. The angles at the junction of the cross arms are hollowed out, forming within the surrounding Quaternion an appearance of a rude circle, but not pierced. The contour of the stone is framed with a moulding of two lines.

The stone in the burial ground stands 40in., clear of the soil and has a maximum width of 23 in., decreasing midway to 15in., On it is incised a plain equal limbed cross within a circle. It is much weathered – visited 28th April 1921.

1833 the population numbered only 113. The Church was dedicated to the C6 Armorican saint Edeyrn who was reputed to have travelled widely and as a result there are churches named for him in North and South Wales, and also Brittany.

The present structure dates only from 1846 but several ancient crosses on the site remain from a much earlier time (Nash Williams 1950 'Early Christian Monuments in Wales' 215 Nos.391-4) are associated with the Church.

The other two will be found at East Williamston and Johnston. The bowls are rather more square-shaped than that of the Amroth cup but none of the three are exactly alike in details of ornamentation. The St. Edren's Chalice bears the familiar maker's Mark.. The bowl carries two bands of decorated strap-work precisely similar to those at Amroth, within the lower of which is engraved " + POCVLVM « ECLESIE » DE * SANT • TEDERENS « " followed by a spray of foliage. Beneath the bowl is a band of vertical Reed ornamentation which is repeated at the junction between the stem and base. This lower band has unfortunately been completely hidden and spoilt in mending. Height, 5 in. ; diam. of bowl, 3 in. ; depth, 2 in. ; diam. of foot, 3 in. ; weight, 4oz. 5 dwts. This is the only chalice of the three that retains its Paten cover, the handle or foot of which carries the date inscription " 1578" with fleur-de-lys above and below; diam., 2in. ; height, 1in.

There is also a pewter Bowl like that at Llanstinan.

Clun Ffwrn Stone

Although marked on the 6in sheet as 'Cromlech" there is only one erect stone, but local tradition persists that it is the survivor of a dismantled cromlech. The stone has a height of 5ft above the soil. Mr Morse of the adjacent farm of Tre Hywell, on which he was born, remembers that a complete circle of stones existed around this monolith, having a diameter of about 30ft and bearing every appearance of being a large cairn. A slight rise of the ground around the stones is perceptible.-- visited 28th April 1921.

Penlan ole Maenhir

In the second field north of Penlan ole House, known as Parc y garreg, is the stump of an erect stone which was blasted some few years ago to obtain material for building. It is said to have had a height of from 7ft to 8ft; this has been reduced to 4ft. visited 28th April 1921.

Trehale Stone

A fine square shaped stone standing on a field south of the drive to Trehale House. It measures 8ft 3in clear of the soil, its four sides being , north 44 ins., south 22ins., east 48in., and west 57., broad. It is not marked on the 6in. Sheet. – visited 28th April 1921.

Tre Hywel Cromlech

In a field appurtenant to Tre Hywell farmhouse are three erect standing stones exhibiting every indication of having been parts of a cromlech, of which the capstone has disappeared; one of the group had a height of six feet above the soil. At a distance of 6ft are the other stones 2ft apart and 4ft above the ground. They are not marked on the 6in. Sheet – visited 28th April 1921. A stone spindle whorl is preserved at the farmhouse which was discovered in the field of the cromlech. It has a diameter of 1in and a thickness of 1/3 inch. The edge bears two incised lines.

Mining --Silver

An attempt to procure silver was made here, but the success with which it was attended was not sufficient to encourage the adventurers to establish any permanent works.

The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £2. 10. 10., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St Davids, by an exchange made with the crown, under a recent act of parliament; net income, £72: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £31, and 10s. Easter offerings.

The Church, dedicated to St. Teilaw, is a small edifice, possessing no features deserving notice: there is no inclosed churchyard, the funerals being generally solemnized in the adjoining parishes of Brawdy and Whitchurch.

Cromlechs

A few yards south west of the ruined Church of St Teilo, are the remains of two cromlechs. Until about the year 1890 they were intact; the tenant then blasted and carted away two of the supports of the eastern cromlech after he had succeeded in dislodging the capstones of both. The remains show two capstones the largest having a length 12ft., and a breadth of 10 ½ ft., with a thickness of 2 ½ ft; the other being 8ft by 5ft and 2 ½ ft., thick. The supports have an average height of 3ft., to 4ft.,. It is possible that the cromlechs were originally covered, as several of the plinth stones, about 3ft high are still in situ to the east of the ruined structures, which themselves stand upon a slight and roughly circular elevation –visited 13th April 1921.

The name of a field near Norchard Cottages. It is not near a crossroad and in view of the fact that it occurs near the birthplace of St Teilo it appears to be worthy of record. – visited 15 April 1915.

Acc/to Old Parish Churches-Salter.

The nave, chancel, north transept, and south transept and tower are all 13th century, and the porch is of c1300, East of the tower is a south Chapel with a two bay arcade. On the north side of the chancel is a vaulted recess giving access to a vaulted vestry. (There were many times I robed before going out to take a Service in this vestry and I always thought of all those through the centuries who had robed there and asked their guidance and I often wondered how Mrs Davies the organist had managed to pick hymns which always suited my sermon text).

This benefice originally comprised a rectory and vicarage both in the patronage of the Crown. In 1594 George Owen describes the rectory as a free Church without care of souls.–Owen's Pem. The vicarage was on 23 November 1860, united with the sinecure rectory under an Order in Council.

Described as Ecclesia de Sancto Florenco, this Church was in 1201 assessed at £13 6s 8d, for tenths to the King, the sum payable being £1 6s. 8d. –Taxatio.

Church in Wales MS AD/AET 1209

1839 St Florence Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

Florence (St.), a parish, in the hundred of Castlemartin, union and county of Pembroke, South Wales, 4½ miles (W. by N.) from Tenby; containing 396 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated on a gentle eminence in the centre of a fertile Valle, sheltered on one side by the northern declivity of the Ridgeway between Pembroke and Tenby. The parish is bounded on the north by the parishes of Carew and Redbarth, on the south by Manorbeer, on the east by Gumfreston, and on the west by Nash and Lamphey. It comprises by a measurement 2470 acres of land, which is chiefly in pasture, and appropriated to dairy-farming, the produce of the parish being principally butter and cheese; the soil rests, in some places, on clay, and in others on limestone, and varies in its quality from great richness and fertility to absolute barrenness. The surface is broken into valleys and hills, and a small brook, flowing through the district to Tenby, diversifies and improves the scenery, which, throughout the whole locality, is highly picturesque and beautiful. Near the village, which forms one of the most cheerful and interesting objects in the delightful ride from Tenby to Pembroke, is situated Ivy Tower, a commodious modern residence, containing a good antiquarian and classical library; and the vicinity of which is ornamented with some ash and elm trees. Many of the cottages, to which large gardens are attached, and which are grouped in pleasing clusters around the Church, are of ancient appearance, and coeval with the castles in the vicinity, having been built by the first generations of the Flemings, who settled in this part of the principality, in the reign of Henry I., by permission of that Monarch, when driven from their own country by an inundation of the sea. There are some limestone-quarries, and a few hands are employed as masons in marblwork.

The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage; the former a sinecure, rated in the King's Books at £16. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge: the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £4. 18. 4., and is endowed with £400 royal bounty; patron, the Rector. These livings, which are at present totally distinct, are in future to be consolidated. The rectorial tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £160, with a glebe of twenty acres, valued at £35 per annum; and the vicarial for a rent-charge of £80, with a glebe of ten acres, valued at £20. The Church, dedicated to St. Florence, is a very ancient, massive, cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty belfry tower, containing four fine-toned bells; the edifice measures seventy-two feet in extreme length, and twenty feet in breadth, and will accommodate about 200 persons with sittings. On the north side of the altar is a mural tablet of brass, with a Latin epitaph, in choriambic verse, to the memory of Robert Rudd, A.B., formerly archdeacon of St Davids, who was ejected from his benefice for his adherence to the cause of Charles I., and died in October, 1648. There is a place of worship for Independents. A Sunday school is held in the village schoolroom in the morning, and in the vicarage-house in the evening; but no day school is supported here, the National school at Redbarth, an adjoining parish, being designed for the children of St. Florence also. The remains of antiquity in and about the village are considerable: in 1835, a small silver cross, inscribed with Saxon characters, was found in the vicarage-garden.

1847 Notes of Older Churches – Glynne printed in Arch Camb 1886 p 57

This Church has a nave, North Transept, tower placed on the south side, and a chancel, with a south Chapel (now divided off) and a vestry on the north. The Church follows the style and peculiar arrangement so prevalent in the west of Pembrokeshire. The nave is wide, and there is a large south porch, within which is a benatura, near the door, and a plain rude niche over it. On the south of the nave is one lancet. At the west end is a late square-headed window, lately restored. The tower, as usual tapers, and is without any strings or buttresses. At the south-east is a square turret, and the whole has the common battlement. On the south side, in the lower part, is a lancet, and no other openings but the belfry – windows which are boube on the south and west, with obtuse heads; on the north with square heads, and no arch; on the east a single narrow slit. The tower is, in its lower part, rudely vaulted in stone, and forms a transept, the arch being of rude and clumsy pointed form. On the west side within the tower are two rude arches formed in the wall. On the east side is a recess which seems once to have opened into the south aisle of the chancel, near which is a rude arch, possibly once the entrance to the rood steps; and another low pointed recess in the wall. The north transept opens by a rude pointed arch and contains some stone brackets. The chancel is vaulted in stone and its arch very plain, springing straight from the wall on each side.. Between the chancel and the Chapel, or aisle on the south, are two oddly shaped depressed arches, very plain and course, with a circular pier having an impost moulding and no base. In the eastern respond is a square recess. There is a pointed doorway on the north side. The east window has three lancets within a general arch of pointed form. On the north of the chancel adjoining the chancel-arch is a rudely shaped, pointed arch formed in the vault, apparently forming a kind of a Chapel, and lighted by a lancet. There are stone brackets which must have supported the rood loft. In the north transept is a two-lighted Decorated window without foils. The font has a square bowl, scalloped below on a low cylinder with square base. There is no west door. The south chancel aisle has no windows, and the roof is rude and singular, but a fair specimen of the style of the west of Pembrokeshire.

1923 St Florence RCAM 1923

The Parish Church dedicated to St Florence

The plan of this building is of a chancel 23ft 6in by 15ft, south chamber to chancel 23ft 6in by 10ft, north Chapel to chancel 14ft by 17ft 6in now used as a vestry, nave 49ft by 18ft, north transept 15ft by 12ft 9 in, south tower 20ft by 17ft 6in externally, and south porch. Except for the nave and north transept, all the roofs have plain vaults. The south chamber, doubtless intended for a mortuary Chapel, opens to the chancel by an arcade of two low depressed arches springing from a circular pier of masonry. There is communication between the chancel and the tower by a passage, 4ft in height, 3ft broad and 5ft 6in in length. The north chancel – Chapel has a plain vault; it was entered by a plain pointed doorway (now blocked), and gives entrance from the churchyard. Between the Chapel and the north aisle or transept is the opening of the stairs to the rood loft. In its north-west angle is a squint to the aisle. The nave had on its south side a doorway between the tower and the porch, of which slight traces are visible. In the external north wall at the west end is a low arched recess 6ft 6in in length, which, when opened out about the year 1835, is said to have contained a stone coffin that has been removed.

The south porch has masonry benches and the remains of a stoup. On the wall hangs a large disused iron key of 17th century date.

The font basin 23ins square externally, 17in internally with an external depth of 14in, is of the cushion type and stands upon a plain circular shaft 54in in circumference; the base is square. It retains traces of a locked cover.

The Chancel was thoroughly restored in the year 1870, when all the windows were practically renewed. The tower is of four stories and of exceptional height, the turret at its south east angle containing ninety stairs. It tapers slightly to the corbel table which is surmounted by battlements. There is no exterior doorway other than that which gives access to the stairs. In the south wall of the ground storey is a single lancet; the only other lights are in the belfry stage, those to the south and west being double, with obtusely pointed arches; on the east is a single plain slit, and on the north are two lights with square heads. The lower storey has two recesses, probably intended for cupboards; both are rudely arched.

In the churchyard are a six-sided shaft now used as a sun-dial stem and an erect stone locally said to be the shaft of a cross. The latter is oblong in shape, with one face showing several rude line-markings which have been mistaken for ogams, but probably are marks of tool sharpening. – visited 16 April 1915

Fragment of Carved Stone

Built into the wall of the vicarage stable, is a stone which appears to be part of a foliated double light; it was inserted in its present position at the restoration of 1870.

A memoir of Birkett, under the above title, is included in George Huntingtons, Random Recollections, published in 1896. Huntington was rector of Tenby and a minor author of considerable repute in his day.

“Dear old Mr.Birkett”, as he was called by his parishioners, was the son of a vicar of Stanton by West Hartlepool, who required his son each morning to light the fire, prepare the early breakfast of oatmeal porridge, and be ready for his first lesson at 5 o’clock. Latin, Greek and divinity would be studied until a later breakfast at 8.30 followed by an hours work in the garden, further study until one, then dinner, after which his father went about his parochial duties. Having taken his degree at St. John College, Cambridge, Birkett became curate at Oswestry, whose vicar being sinecure rector of St.Florence appointed him vicar of that parish in 1828. He found his best route for travelling to that remote Pembrokeshire parish from his Durham home was by the Liverpool packet steamer to Wexford, to re-cross the Irish Sea to Milford Haven and thence in a rowing boat to Pembroke and thence to St. Florence.

The Church, Birkett discovered, was in a ruinous state. The cocks and hens roosted in the building, and a horse was stabled in the porch. The Church was restored; a vicarage was built planned by his wife. And here in this out of the way place Birkett lived the life of a parish priest in the tradition of George Herbert. Medical skills he had picked up at Oswestry meant he doctored all the poorer parishioners, he made wills, drew up indentures, reconciled disputes, discouraged litigation, established a benefit club to encourage thrift, recommended the well conducted youth for situations, and excommunicated the offenders! His hobby was his Church choir, and Huntington noted that many suggested that in engaging a servant what mattered more than skill in cooking or housekeeping was a good voice and aptness to sing. He even arranged an annual concert for his choir at Tenby, giving them a good supper, conducting it himself, and purchasing White gloves for all the singers.

Birkett kept up his scholarship. Huntington once took Bishop Ellicott of Gloucester to meet him. Over tea a respectful Birkett conversed on the respective merits of Gladstone's and Lord Derby's translation of Homer. As the two guests left, Ellicott remarked to Huntington that Birkett had not only retained his scholarship in the forty-five years he had spent in that remote village, he had positively gone on with the critical scholarship of the day. He also tried his hand at poetry, but without much success.

Archdeacon Allen of Salop, a former pupil of his, wrote:

“He came to St. Florence to do the will of Him that sent him, not in a spirit of self-assertion, but taking cheerfully the lowest place. He was one of the holdfast of society. All, that came under his happy influence were, as I think, helped and stirred up to love and good works.” And Huntington concludes: “The beauty of his character was its simplicity, and nothing could induce him to go from his early hours and quiet habits. He lived among his people, visited them from house to house, and had a kind word and a kinder smile for the children. His preaching was calm and unimpassioned, but instructive, often flavoured with old world-scholarship which he never obtruded, but could not always keep back. He was on the best terms with all his parishioners, Dissenters included: the resident preacher was his guest at his tithe dinners, and used to propose the Parsons health. In this diocese there lived no more faithful minister of God, no more earnest, true childlike Christian, than the vicar of St. Florence.” (From Welsh Church Life June 1997 by Roger Brown).

In 1923 the Vicarage of Redberth was united with the Rectory of St. Florence.

1847 The State of Education in Wales Parish of St Florence

On 24th of December I visited the above parish. The only school which it contained was a Sunday school, held in the village school room in the morning and in the vicarage in the evening. The children from this parish go to school in the adjoining parish of Redberth, where the schoolroom was, as the Vicar of St Florence informed me “built constitutionally for a part of St Florence” It is, by agreement between himself and the Clergyman at Redberth, open to all children from St Florence. There was one Dissenting Chapel in the Parish but no Sunday School held in it. The parish clerk , who is one of the teachers in the Church Sunday school is paid £2 2s for his services, and further subscriptions are made, which together make his salary amount to £3 5s per annum.

Wages for labourers average 7s per week – they are all remarkably sober and tolerably industrious

David Lewis Assistant

I called on the Rev Mr Birkett on the 28th of December and examined in his house two of his best scholars from his Sunday School, a boy and a girl, who passed a creditable and not very easy examination on scriptural subjects. The boy had only been for a short time in a day school in Gloucestershire four or five years before; could write only imperfectly; had never learned arithmetic; and was constantly at work in the week. He repeated long passages from the Gospels by heart in answer to several of my questions. Previously to the union of St Florence's parish in supporting the school at Redberth, there had been one or two dame-schools in St Florence: but the dames could not make a living; and on the last of them giving up her school about two months before my visit, the arrangement was effected with Redberth shortly afterwards This latter school afforded sufficient accommodation for the children of St Florence.

The state of the farm servants is generally very bad. So long as they do their work they are well treated by the farmers, but no moral care or control is exercised over them. They sleep in the outbuildings and keep their own hours. They do not generally attend school or any place of worship on the Sabbath. There is a considerable difference in this part of the county, as to the relation in which they stand to the farmers, compared with the Welsh districts. There the farmers associate with them habitually and familiarly. Here they are very tenacious of their distinctive rank and in this neighbourhood are mostly Churchmen. The inhabitants of St Florence are small mechanics rather than agricultural. The farm servants come from other parishes.

Church in Wales MS AD/AET 1209

Pembrokeshire life 1572 1843

St Govans (Chapel),

Hermitage probably dates from the end of 13c and was erected on the site of an older building internally 18x12. Popularly dedicated to St Govan but who was he or she?

St Cofen the wife of a King of South Wales killed in battle in the 6c? (to confirm this it is said that the bones found under the alter tomb were those of a woman).

The Irish St Gobham abbot of Dairinis who made this his hermitage to end his days?

Sir Gawaine of the round Table who built this Hermitage after the passing of Arthur?

It is situated halfway down the cliffs, with 52 steps although it is said you cannot count them twice and get the same number.

Inside a simple stone altar under which St Govan is said to have been buried, aumbry beside it on the South wall, in the floor on the North side is a little spring which drains under the floor to the sea and has stone benches of oratories typical of west of Ireland.

To the left of the altar up some steps is a little doorway leading to a niche in the rock.

Acc/to Fenton. Just large enough to contain a middle size man in a crouching position.... There are numerous superstitions annexed to this miraculous cell, such that it opened at first to offer shelter to a saint closely pursued by his pagan persecutors and after the chase was given up and the danger opened to let him out again.

The hermitage has an empty Bell cote. It is said that it once contained a silver Bell which was stolen by pirates, but a great storm arose and their ship was wrecked nearby.

St Govan's Well now dry but waters reputed to have cured eye trouble: "The watter of thes sprynges ys sayd to bee gud for manie dystempres" [Edward Lluyd Tudor visitor.]

St Ishmaels,

[Situated on the North shore of the Milford-Haven not far from Dale. It has a little Church a way from the village in an idyllic valley ornamented with windblown trees and shrubs, rocks and ivy. The churchyard is in two parts, connected by a charming bridge across the stream. The village is reputed to date back to the 10th century and when Ann Boleyn was Marchioness of Pembroke she received an annuity out of the issues of five villages of which St Ishmaels in Roose was one. The village appears on Saxton's map of 1578 although it could not have been very big as it is estimated that the population was between 210 and 260 in 1670 and at the present in Winter is about 400 although it did reach a peak of 528 in 1851. There is an old motte north of the village.

The Church was originally founded in the 6th century by St Ishmael the son of a Cornish Prince Budic. He was a disciple of St Davids and is thought to have been appointed Bishop of St David's by St Teilo on St David's death in 589AD. In the 10th C the building is thought to have formed part of a teaching Monastery. The pre Norman carved cross within the Church dates from this period. The original building was a small structure and was rebuilt by St Caradog at the start of the 12 C with the Chancel and Trancepts being much later additions. More extensive rebuilding was undertaken about 1660 and again in the 19C.

1849 St Ishmaels Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

Ishmael'S (St.), a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Rhôs, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Milford; containing 502 inhabitants. It is situated on the northern shore of Milford Haven, and is separated from the parish of Herbrandston by Sandy Haven. There are several respectable residences within its limits, though not entitled to notice as seats of importance; the principal is a neat residence, supposed to have been originally a Grange belonging to Hubberston Priory. Monk Haven, a small estuary, forms a convenient landing-place for boats, and is much frequented as a bathing station, being peculiarly sheltered from the south-west wind, the prevailing wind on this coast. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the King's Books at £6. 12. 8½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor: the vicarial tithes have been commuted for £120, with a glebe of nearly seven acres and a quarter, valued at £10 per annum. The Church is romantically situated in a deep sequestered valley, on Monk Haven, which falls into Milford Haven a short distance below; on its bank are also situated the glebe and parsonage-house, the latter a neat cottage ornée in the Elizabethan style, with a flower-garden and shrubbery between it and the Church, and a small stream flowing through the lawn in front. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A day school and a Sunday school are held, in connexion with the Church. £1, a portion of a rent-charge of £6 issuing out of Butter Hill, in the parish, bequeathed by Thomas Roche, esq., is distributed among poor parishioners, chiefly widows, at Christmas. Immediately above the Church is a tenement called Monks, supposed to have been connected with the priory of Hubberston. In the village is a remarkable tumulus, but nothing is known of its history, nor does it appear to have been opened.

1856 September 16th Glynne Arch Camb 1886

A Church wholly of the South Pembrokeshire type, but creditably distinguished from its neighbours in having undergone a well intended though not quite satisfactory restoration, and being in a clean and tidy condition, most rare in this part of the country. The plan is cruciform without aisles, the transepts being rather as Chapels. There is a south porch and a Quasi steeple at the west end common in the vicinity, being a sort of thin tower perforated by two arches for bells, and a modern west window inserted. The interior is very neat; but the pews though regular, are far too high. The north transept opens to the nave by a rude obtuse arch; that to the chancel is equally rude, but pointed. The chancel is new and larger than the original one which was very small and low. There is the stone ledge on each side of the base of the chancel arch – a feature of the country. To the south transept there is none. The curious oblique hagioscopes common in Pembrokeshire, and nowhere else, occur here forming rude vaulted passages from each transept into the chancel, and cutting off the angles. They are vaulted, fitted with stone seats, and lighted by small slits. These open to the chancel by very rude arches: the northern round, the southern nearly flat. There are square recesses in the wall, north and south of the altar. On the south is the bowl of a piscina. The chancel window is Decorated, of two lights; also some in the transepts; but these seem to have been restored. One window is late, square headed with label; and in the west wall of the south transept is a small square window. Some new painted glass has been introduced. The font has a square bowl, scalloped below, on a short cylindrical stem. The roof and pavement are new. There is an octagonal stoup in the porch. The outer walls are finely covered with ivy. The site beautiful and sequestered, and the spacious churchyard consists of very steep ground. [In 1884 the pews were replaced by good open sittings, and the entire Church put in excellent order.]

1920 The Parish Church Dedicated to St Ishmael RCAM

The present Church has probably developed out of a small nave and chancel, which gave way in the 18th century to a larger edifice containing two transeptal Chapels but no western tower. The transepts communicate with the chancel by diagonal passages; that from the north transept being 14 ½ ft in length and lighted midway by a single Early English trifoliated lancet. The south transept has a tomb recess now empty. The font is of the square cushion type.

Carved and Incised Crosses

- 1] A slab broken below the cross arms; bears a panel of simple plait work on either side of the plain lower limb of the cross. On the back of the cross is a smaller equal-armed cross carved in outline.
- 2] A fragment of a stone pillar bearing a plain cross, outlined by double lines, of the same character as that carved upon the previous mentioned stone.
- 3] A worked stone bearing an equal armed cross within a circle, the quadrants ended with deeply -cusped curves --visited 29th July 1920

Acc/to Old Parish Churches – Salter.

The 13th century nave and small chancel are connected by a narrow and sharply pointed arch. The north transept has a round arch towards the nave and a lancet in the squint to the chancel. The chancel has an original lancet and the nave has a blocked north doorway. The smaller south transept with a tomb recess and squint is Tudor. The porch may be medieval but has an 18th or 19th century outer arch of brick. The nave west wall is thickened to carry a double belfry.

St Ishmael's Day School

I visited this school on the 14th January; the scholars were not present; I was accompanied by the Vicar and the Rural Dean; the mistress had been for two days to Dale to learn some parts of the system adopted by Mrs Bevan's schoolmaster; she considered Thursday (the day of my visit) as too late to commence school for the week; she appeared a tolerably intelligent person; there had previously been a master in the parish more competent to teach writing and arithmetic ; but he had taken little pains to improve the children in anything else, and was not a person of good character.

Besides the mistress teaches the girls to sew. The children attending this school are those of labourers. It would not seem however that the school meets the wants of the parish. The farmer's children go mostly to the Tabernacle school, which is kept in the Independent Chapel by the Minister. He seemed an intelligent man. His scholars were not present In reply to a question which I asked him about the religious instruction given, his exact words were - "The religious instruction is wholly unsectarian. I teach them their plain duty to God and man -nothing but the most important truths of Christianity."

Musslewick (St Ishmaels) 1811 Fenton

Formerly the residence of a Flemish chieftain whose attestation frequently occurs in ancient deeds, is now inhabited by a respectable freeholder of the name of Runawae; and at no great distance on the opposite side of the promontory there is a small cove called Runawae's Kell, or retreat. Why may it not be presumed that the first of that family who came in this country was some fugitive ,who took shelter here till the cause of his concealment was over ; then borrowed a name from the particular circumstance, mixed with the people and engrafted himself on the country, whose descendants became men of property.

Mullock Bridge--Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmins 1895

Another mile brings us to Mullock Bridge, where a Long causeway traverses a marshy backwater of the Haven.

About this same bridge a quaint story is related concerning Sir Rhys ap Thomas of Carew. Having registered a vow before the King that Henry of Richmond should not ascend the throne save over his body, the crafty knight fulfilled his word by crouching beneath the arch of Mullock bridge while Henry rode across it.

Mullocks Bridge, St Ishmael's RCAHMW

1895 Hoaton – Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmins

After a flying visit to the lighthouses, we retrace our steps to Dale village, and, following a track around the head of the tideway, push on without a halt to Hoaton. Here we find the huge old anchor and the question naturally arises, how did the anchor get there ? A vague tradition still lingers in the locality to the effect that, centuries ago, a big foreign man-o'-war was driven out of her course and wrecked upon the shores of St. St Bride's Bay. Hence it has been conjectured that this anchor may be a veritable relic of that ' wonderful great and strong ' Spanish Armada, whose unwieldy galleons were cast ashore and dashed to pieces upon our western coasts, three hundred years ago.

Be that as it may, some years back the anchor, which had previously lain by the wayside, was dragged into the position where it now stands ; the neighbours lending ready aid in response to offers of ale ad lib. Fifty men with a team of horses were hard put-to to move it, for though much of the metal has rusted and flaked away, the shank is 20 feet long and nearly 30 inches thick, while the head of the anchor measures some 14 feet around, and the ring is large enough for a man to pass through. Truly that old Spanish galleon must have been a veritable Leviathan to require such an anchor as this !

RCAM

Medieval Anchor

On the lawn of Great Hoaton farmhouse rests a huge iron anchor, a relic of the Spanish Armada, according to local tradition. The shank is 17ft 6in long , the flutes measure 14ft 6ins across and the ring has a diameter of 2ft 6ins. Hoaton is over a mile from the sea. The anchor is at intervals carefully painted by the Pembrokeshire Association for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments --Seen 28th July 1920.

Promontory Fort

Great Castle Head

This is a fine cliff fort of ordinary character, the enclosed area being about 8 acres. The curvered bank has a length of some 500ft, and a height of 5ft from the level. There is a wide but shallow ditch. The entrance at the western end of the bank has been narrowed by cliff falls. --visited 29th July 1920

Great Castle Head is on a cliff-girt headland, roughly 160m north-south by up to 260m. It is divided from the mainland to the north by a line of two ramparts with a medial ditch, some 150m in length. Recent structures within this area include defence installations, a lighthouse and a possible folly

Earthworks

Brock's Castle

This is a prominent and well preserved earthwork situated in a fields of the same name belonging to Middelins farm. In shape it is a deep semicircle or horse shoe. There is only one bank which varies in heighth between 6 and 8ft and is constructed of mixed earth and stone; there is a shallow ditch – visited 1st October 1920

St Ishmael's Tump

This mound is styled “Tumulus “ on the Ordinance sheets , but it is a quite unmistakable mound Castle with “traces of the Bailey discernible in a hedge bank a few yards to the north” (T C Cantrill in Arch Camb 1915 p171). It has a circumference on the level of 300ft and is about 20ft high. The ditch is 3ft deep; on the south east side are some indications which probably denote the point of crossing –visited 28th July 1920

St Ishmaels Tump

A ditched mound, 32m in diameter and 5.5m high appears to show traces of a dam to the East, which would have ponded back an area of c.160m North-South by 100m. A Bailey enclosure may have lain to the S, between the motte and a mere.

RCAHMW

Longstone Field

A stone of hard, weathered, red sandstone, 2.0m high by 1.2m by 0.5m, 'recently removed' in 1979. excavation at the site showed that the stone had been erected in a trapezoid arrangement of pits, some containing cremations. A scattering of pit and stake holes was partly resolvable into coherent patterns. A radio-carbon date of c.1355BC was obtained from the fill of an associated recut pit (Williams Benson 1979; Williams 1980). Apparently re-erected in adjacent hedge. RCAHMW

St Lawrence,

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

Lawrence (St.), a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dewisland, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 8½ miles (N. by W.) from Haverfordwest; containing 223 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the north-western part of the county, and comprehends a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, of which the greater portion is inclosed and in a good state of cultivation, the soil, though varying in different parts, being in general fertile. The total area is 1328 acres. The surface is boldly undulated; the scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing, and from the higher grounds some good views are obtained. The great South Wales railway will pass in this vicinity. The parochial rates are assessed by the ploughland. The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £3. 18. 9., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £80, and there is a glebe of thirty acres, valued at £20 per annum; also a glebe-house. The Church is dedicated to St. Lawrence, from which circumstance the parish derives its name: it is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A Church Sunday school was commenced in 1840.

1921 The Parish Church dedicated to St Lawrence –RCAM

On plan the structure shows a chancel 19ft., by 11ft., nave 26ft., by 16 ½ ft., and south porch. It was restored in 1877; the roof and windows are modern. Behind the altar and running the entire length of the east end of the chancel is a narrow stone ledge, one foot above the floor. In the north west Angle of the chancel are remains of the rood stairs. The chancel arch is a plain circular headed opening. The entrance doorway is plain pointed; above it is a narrow stone corbel table. The porch has a plain vault, a pointed doorway and the fragment of a damaged stoup. The scallop font basin 24in square externally. 18 in square internally, and 8in deep chamfers off to a circular shaft 10in high; the base is modern.

Mutilated Free standing Cross

Built into the south wall of the chancel is a mutilated cross. It has a length of 17 ½ in., and a width of 9in., the arms were enclosed in a circle of which only one of the four sections now remains. The cross is carved in relief, and the spaces at the Angles are pierced. The entire is covered with a double four plait ornament. There is no inscription. It is not included in Mr Romilly Allen's 'Catalogue of the early Christian Monument in Pembrokeshire'

Loose in the Church is a fragment of another cross 12in by 9in which has been roughly shaped. It is plain and worn, and is said to have been found in the burial ground. It is much weathered to admit of dating.-- visited 14th April 1921

St. Lawrence. — The present Chalice is a tall cup, 11 in. in height, resting on a baluster stem, and bearing the Hall Mark of 1751 with maker's Mark I C as in O. E. P. at 1737. On the bowl is inscribed " The Gift Mrs M : F : 1752 ". The donor may have been the wife of William Ford of Stone Hall in the parish of St. Lawrence who was sheriff of Pembrokeshire in 1764. Diam. of bowl, 3 in. ; depth, 3in. ; diam. of base, 3in.

— A modern Paten, Hall-marked 1877 with maker's Mark in plain square for Cox & Sons of London ; weight, 3 oz. 10 dwts. Beneath is inscribed " The Gift of Rev Edward Peacock. Church Restored 1877". The doner who restored the Church of St. Lawrence was the grandson of William Lort Mansel, a well-known wit and writer of epigrams, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards Bishop of Bristol. His father was William Wogan Mansel of Pembroke and his grandfather Thomas Mansel of Pearice Castle, Glamorganshire. He was educated at Haverfordwest Grammar School. After resigning the living of road Hill, Wilts, in 1873, the Rev. Edward Peacock bought and resided at Stone Hall in the parish of St. Lawrence. He found the Church in a most dilapidated condition and set to work to collect money for its restoration which so aroused the antagonism and animosity of the then rector, the Rev William Meyler, that the work was not commenced until his death which took place about 1875.

Stone Hall which once belonged to the Wogans was sold by Mr. Peacock in 1880 to the Rev, Murray Walters. Mr. Peacock died at Nunney, Frome, in January 1904, aged 83 years.

Sites of Interest

Ford- site Roman Building RCAHMW

Site of Roman building, noted by Fenton (Tour through Pembroke. (1811), 333-4); building material & surface traces subsequently noted (St Joseph 1961 (JRS 51), 131); confirmed by geophysical survey & limited excavation 2003 (Merrony 2004 (J. Pemb. Hist. Soc. 13), 5-22): the villa evidently consisted of at least one stone-founded range, about 18.5m north-west to south-east by at least 7.5m, thought to have incorporated a bath suite: no indications of an enclosure about the villa were noted by the survey, although a rectangular enclosure complex to the east may have been associated with it. The site lies on a shelf of level ground on a north- facing hillside: its relationship with settlement enclosure roughly 100m to the west is uncertain. RCAHMW 2004.

A small Archaeological investigation by the Dyfed Archaeological Trust was carried out in 2010 at the site to determine if it was necessary to place the area under statutory protection and to define an area for proposed scheduling. No evidence was found of a Roman villa within the area excavated, however any evidence may have been destroyed by agricultural activity or the actual site of the villa may be located outside of the area investigated. Geophysical surveys did reveal rectilinear field systems to the east of the area investigated which may be associated with Roman activity.

Archaeology in Wales 2010 50, 95.

St Lawrence Fort

A promontory fort where a roughly 68m swathe of two north-west facing banks with a medial ditch cut off a tongue of land, about 90m deep, tapering to the east above the confluence of two streams; a third bank reinforces the entrance at the southern end of the bank-system: there are unconfirmed reports of Roman building material being found here.

RCAHMW J.Wiles 07.05.2002

St Lawrence Camp –RCAM

A triangular shaped enclosure some 300 yds north west of the parish Church. The defence consists of a rampart thrown across a neck of land, and steep slopes to two narrow streams which converge at this point. The earthwork overlooks and commands a Ford of the western Cleddau, which here is the parish boundary. The area of the camp is about half an acre in extent. The rampart has a length of about 180ft and a height of 5ft with a fall of 8ft to a ditch now much filled in. On the outer side of the ditch are traces of a low bank. The entrance, which was at the south end of the rampart has been considerably altered. The 6 in Ord sheet places here the site of a “Roman Villa” for which the sole evidence seems to be a statement made to the enquirer for the Pembrokeshire Archaeological Survey by the then rector of the parish, the late Rev J Bowen, that about the year 1875 'some tiles were found here, and stones used for a pig sty' Enquiries respecting such a discovery proved futile. The not very distant site of Castell Flemish may also have had an effect upon popular imagination. – visited 14th April 1921.

Caer[?cae] hir Earthwork

About 70 yds west of Caer Hit (Long Camp) Cottage is a circular earthwork, marked on the 6in sheet as “Supposed remains of Castell”. All that is visible is a low bank, 100ft in length, slightly bowed to the north, having a height of 2ft to 3ft and a width of 8ft. The east end of the bank seems to form one side of an entrance. There is now no appearance of circular outline, as suggested on the Ordinance Sheet. The remains are surrounded by a waterlogged Moor, and in Winter are isolated and unapproachable. There is no ditch –visited 14th April 1921.

Stone Hall

A house of no Archaeological interest, said to be named from the 'cromlech formerly there' (Pem Arch Survey) but of which there is now no trace or tradition

St Nicholas

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales –St Nicholas' (St.) Lewis

Nicholas' (St.), a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dewisland, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Fishguard; containing 346 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the north-western part of the county, and at no great distance from St. George's Channel, comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. From the high grounds in the north and south parts of it, some fine s are obtained of the Channel. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed, with that of Mathrey, to the discharged vicarage of Granston: the tithes of the parish have been commuted for a rent-charge of £153, of which £102 are payable to the impropriator, and £51 to the vicar, who has likewise a glebe of thirty-six acres, valued at £25 per annum. The Church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is not remarkable for any architectural details; in the fence of the churchyard is a stone, about a yard and a half in length, and threequarters of a yard in breadth, with an old inscription. There is a place of worship for Independents, in which a Sunday school is also held. At no great distance from the Church, just above the village of Trellŷs, are the remains of an ancient cromlech, the table stone of which rests only upon two supporters: there is another cromlech at Fynnondrudian.

Nicholas (St.), a parish, with a village, in Haverfordwest district, Pembroke; near the coast, 4½ miles W by S of Fishguard, and 12½ N W by W of Clarbeston-road r. station. Post-town, Fishguard, under Haverfordwest. Acres, 2, 141. Real property, £1, 624. Pop.in 1851, 3 55; in 1861, 284. Houses, 66. There are remains of a cromlech. The living is a vicarage, annexed to the vicarage of Granston, in the diocese of St Davids. There is an Independent Chapel.

The Church dedicated to St Nicholas

The nave, chancel and vaulted south transept with a squint are all probably 13th century but no old openings survive. A thick west wall carried a belfry. The bellcote was restored in 1865.

St Nicholas (Pembrokeshire) Glynne August 3rd 1850

A small Church, in general features resembling Llanwda but not having aisles, but a south transept Chapel. The arches opening to both chancel and transept are very plain, low and middle pointed ones. The south transept has a plain pointed vault. The rest has wide Welsh open roofs. There is a Sanctus Bell cote in the east gable of the nave , and two in the west gable, which forms a small projection. At the angle between the chancel and transept is a kind of hagioscope. The font resembles that Llanwnda but the bowl diminishes downwards. The windows all abominable modern inventions, and the interior very dirty and damp.

In this wild, stony parish are several cromlechs some also in Llanwnda.

The Parish Church Dedicated to St Nicholas RCAM 1920

This Church was restored in 1865. It consists of a small chancel, nave and south Chapel; the last has a plain vaulted roof, and communicates with the chancel by a passage 8ft in height, 7 ½ ft in breadth and 8 ½ ft in length. The windows are modern. The font is 22 in., square externally, with a bowl 19in in diameter; it stands upon a low circular shaft and base. The belfry is strengthened externally by a rude buttress of masonry – visited 29th April 1920.

Inscribed Stones

Formerly in the churchyard wall (Lhuyd says 'on the east side of the porch') but now fixed against the chancel wall is a rude stone 30in., by 12in., inscribed with a plain cross and the characters TVNCCETACE VXSOR DAARI HIC IACIT . At a later date what was doubtless intended to be a equal armed cross was carved upon the stone. That the cross followed the lettering is shown by its slightly one sided position on the face of the stone.

Leaning against the chancel wall are two other pillar stones, which formerly served as gateposts on the farm of Llandrudian.

A stone 4ft in height and 1 ¼ ft wide , inscribed +PAAN-

A stone 4ft in height and 1 ¼ ft in width, inscribed WES – Between the W and the E a hanger hole has been cut thus partially obliterating the final diagonal stroke of the letter W but leaving faint traces of it.

This Church under its ancient name of Ecclesia de Villa Camerarii, was appropriated by Bishop Thomas Beck in 1287 to the Subchanter of St David's Cathedral, but the right of presentation seems to have been reserved by the Bishop. - Stat Menev.

This Church must have been united to Granston prior to 1535-6. The same incumbents served both churches. All the presentations are by the Bishop and all incumbents instituted between the years 1672 and 1824 held in addition the living of Mathry.

Described as Ecclesia de Villa Carmerarii, this Church was in 1291 assessed at £6 13s 4d. for tenths to the King, the sum payable being 13s 4d. - Taxatio.

The only lease of this living found among the was granted on 25 July, 1663, by Michael Barwicke of Herbrandston, clerk, prebendary of St. Nicholas, to Jane Edwards of Summerhill, Pems., widow, for the lives of Thomas Edwards (her son and heir apparent), E..... Edwards (her eldest daughter), and Margaret Edwards (the second daughter of the said Jane Edwards),.

The Church of St. Nicholas was restored in 1865. - Arch. Camb. Ser. V., Vol. V., p. 131.

Ffynnon Drudian Cromlech and Standing Stone RCAM

In a field on Ffynnon Drudian Farm are the remains of a small cromlech. The capstone 5 ½ ft in length, 3 ½ ft., in breadth and 1 ft thick lies to the north west to south east; so far as observation is possible, it appears to be supported by two stout pillars. The immediate surface for some yards around is much strewn with rough stone. About 600yds due south, and within sight of the cromlech, is an erect stone standing 8ft clear of the soil, and having a circumference of 10ft, which probably served as a pointer to the cromlech. The field adjoining is known as Parc y Garreg (Fenton Tour p240 states that five flint celts, 'having the broad end worn down to a rounder edge, and the smaller end chipped out into little hollows to admit of a firmer grasp' were found near this cromlech-- visited 29th April 1920 – Arch Camb 1872 IV iii 139.

Trellys Cromlech RCAM

This Cromlech is locally known as 'ffyst Samson'. It stands 400ft above sea level, and commands a wide of sea and land. The capstone 7ft by 6ft by 2ft thick, and slightly leaning to the east, stands upon two supports, one 9ft and the other 5ft high with a space between them of 7ft. Distinct traces of the base of a tumulus 20ft in diameter are to be seen around the cromlech, and some of the foundation stones are yet in situ. The exposed spot on which the structure stands is known as 'Garn dole'. Close to the south hedge of the next field west of the cromlech is an erect stone, somewhat pointed, with a height of 3ft above the ground, which may have been connected with the cromlech –visited 29th April 1920

Rhos y Clegyrn Circle and Standing Stone. RCAM

$\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east of the parish Church the Ord Survey sheet marks 'Remains of a circle' said in the Pem Arch Survey to have been 'a circle of stones 27yds by 22yds' It adds that 'there are faint traces of an inner circle 8yds by 7yds' All that is visible today is the faint outline of a circle, from which every stone had disappeared. Careful excavation would doubtless reveal further details. Immediately north of the circle some 10yds from it is a fine erect stone 9ft above the surface, with a girth of 12ft 6in and tapering slightly to the base. visited 29th April 1920

Mound RCAM

Immediately west of the parish Church are the very slight remains of what the Ord Survey sheet terms the 'Site of a tumulus'. So little of the work has escaped destruction that it is impossible to be sure of its character. Apparently the mound had a circumference of some 150ft. The name of the field on which it stood 'Parc Castell' and its proximity to the Church, would seem to suggest a mound castle rather than a tumulus. Local tradition asserts that part of a wall was standing here some sixty years ago – visited 30th April 1920.

Parc y garn

A stony field on the farm of Carn Segan; the name points to the presence of a vanished Cairn

Porth y Castell

This field is marked on the Ord Survey sheet as 'Site of Castell'. The only indication on the field is a circular depression about 130ft in diameter which may possibly indicate the site of some antiquity – visited 29th April 1920.

Parc y fynwent

The second field north of Llandrudian farm house, where 'a grave yard and stone lined graves have recently been destroyed. The field is known as Weirglodd y fynwent 'the grave yard meadow"

Parc y Rath

The second field west of Parc Castell on which are vestiges of some earthworks, but of too slight a nature to permit of definite description. --visited 30th April 1920.

St Nons,

Only the lower parts of this plain rectangular Chapel now remain.

This must be one of the most idyllically situated monuments in Pembrokeshire, overlooking, as it does, the rocky coastline above St. Non Bay on the Pembrokeshire Coastal Path. The ruins lack any distinguishing features to help date the building, and the earliest reference to a Chapel here is in a document of 1335. However, an early excavation reports the uncovering of stone coffins which might in fact have been slab-lined graves of the early Christian period. Also the presence here of the pillar-stone with its incised Latin cross, roughly dateable to the 7th to 9th century, is suggestive of an early medieval foundation for the Chapel, although unfortunately, there is no firm evidence that the stone originally came from the site.

One legend is that St Non was seeking shelter as she was about to give birth and found a prehistoric Kistvan of three upright stones and a large covering stone giving shelter from the storm. It is there in that ancient shelter that St David was born and the Chapel later built on the holy place.

The Chapel is a simple rectangular building, with an entrance of the west. The north-south orientation of the building is unusual, and is probably best explained by the foundations having been laid out to suit the severe slope. The massive masonry on the southern, downhill end was presumably put down as part of a foundation platform, to help level the site. The position of the altar is marked by a step at the north end. The Chapel is traditionally held to mark the place where St Non gave birth to St David.

The Chapel was one of the more important sea-shore Chapels in the area; two pilgrimages to St David's were held in the medieval period to equal one to Rome, and pilgrims to the Chapel gave money which was taken to the cathedral. After the Reformation, pilgrims came to St David's in fewer numbers, and St Nons Chapel passed out of religious use. It was converted into a dwelling house, and later into a vegetable garden.

The Holy well, just to the east of the Chapel, continued to be a famous place for healing even after the Reformation, and there are antiquarian references to the pious offering pins and pebbles at the well on 2 March, St Nons Day. In the 18th century, the present stone vault was built over it, though this may have replaced an earlier well building.

St Petrox --St Pedrog

(One of the earliest places that as a new Reader I took the service. I had never been there before although I had passed the Church many times and so I got there about an hour before the time of the Service so that I could have a look round and spent a very pleasant time being show around by the Churchwarden who had also arrived early. That morning I had been very nervous but my fears and worries had gone completely by the time I had robed and stood up to start the Service – I felt a feeling of warmth and peace there. I must thank the Rev. Richards for some of the information regarding this Church and the other Churches in his parish as well as giving permission for me to use his work on the parish Registers also the parishioners of the various Churches for their help.)

It is a small windswept Church on a bend in the road. The first view of the Church from the road shows a Church where the body of the Church is red sandstone but with a grey limestone tower. I have wondered whether the old building was covered with Red Sandstone as was the tower of Warren Church. The view from the top of the tower is spectacular.

When I first inquired about the Church I was told that it was haunted!

I never felt that myself but later when researching I did find that St Petrox is connected with a legend of a lady of the Mansell family who is said to wander headless according to Four Welsh Counties - Kilner1891.

Fenton 1810, records that this lady is often seen whirling round this vicinity in her carriage, with a headless coachman, headless horses and herself headless. Also she is said to have ridden in a fiery chariot from Tenby and alighted on the farmhouse of Samson and crushed it. (Was her second marriage happy????)

Who was St Petrox?

The Church, is dedicated to St. Petrox or Petrocus. He lived in the 6th Century, and emigrated perhaps from somewhere in South Wales to Ireland . There he studied for some time in Monasteries before visiting Rome and eventually settling in Cornwall, where he set up a monastic and missionary centre at Padstow. Later he is said to have lived as a hermit on Bodmin Moor. According to William of Worcester St. Petrox died on 4th June 564. The old name of Bodmin was in fact Petrockstow, and Padstow is probably a corruption of the same name. His relics were presented, and greatly revered, in a casket in Bodmin Church until in 1177 when they were stolen and carried off to the abbey of St. Mevennus in Brittany. It required a personal intervention on the part of Henry II to secure their return.

There are two other Churches dedicated to St. Petrox in Wales - Llandedrog (North Wales) and Verwig (Cardiganshire), as well as 17 in Devon and 6 in Cornwall, including Bodmin and Padstow. Brittany has 8 churches dedicated to him.

A Topographical Dictionary of Wales (S. Lewis, 1833).

"PETROX (St.), a parish in the hundred of Castlemartin, county of Pembroke, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.W.) from Pembroke, containing 77 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Llan Pedrog, derives its name from the dedication of its Church to St. Pedrog, a British saint, who flourished about the commencement of the seventh century. It comprises but a very moderate tract of arable and pasture land, and is chiefly distinguished for the salubrity of the air, and the Longevity of its inhabitants: the surface is pleasingly varied, and the soil fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St.David's, rated in the King's Books at £7. 3. 9., and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The Church, dedicated to St. Pedrog, is a neat edifice, with a handsome square tower, and is situated on an eminence commanding a pleasing view over the adjacent country. Attached to the living is a comfortable glebe-house, pleasantly situated and in good repair, with a moderate portion of land. The poor children of this parish have the privilege of gratuitous instruction in the parochial school at Cheriton. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £58. 15."

The Church.

The oldest parts of the present structure are the tower and part of the North wall, which probably date from the 13th. century and with corbelled out parapets. The limestone tower is of the typically tall narrow Pembrokeshire style with a pronounced batter – i.e. narrower at the top than at the bottom, like so many of the other churches you can see on the skyline - when you look at a map you can see that there is a line of Churches along the spine of the Castlemartin Peninsular each with a tall tower and all these towers are reputed to date from the 13/14c, and with corbelled out parapets. Were these towers built as lookouts for Pembroke Castle?

Richard Fenton, 1811 Historical Tour through Pembrokeshire, states :-

I ascend to St Petrocks a rectory in the gift of Lord Cawder on which is a very comfortable glebe house, where the Rev Charles Pritchett, one of his Lordship's chaplains resides. The Church is small but very light, airy and neat. The only conspicuous monument, is a handsome mural marble tablet to the memory of a Lady Jane Mansell, first married to Sir Roger Lort, and then to Sir Edward Mansell of Muddlescombe, Bart. In the county of Carmarthen. (She is the lady of the Ghost story- After recounting the story Fenton goes on to say) What could have given rise to such strange tales of this salamander and decapitated lady, I could never learn. A tombstone commemorates one Clerk, a former rector of this parish and an elegant little brass tablet in the chancel, another of the name of Lloyd .

The Church was extensively restored, almost to the extent of rebuilt in 1854, the architect being R. Kyrke Penson, and the whole cost being borne by John Frederick, first Earl Cawdor. A vestry was added at the same time on the North side.

A note in the flyleaf of the Baptisms Register reads,

"The Church of St. Petrox was reopened March 11 1855 having undergone a thorough restoration, with new sittings; the Chancel rebuilt and a new Vestry Room added, at the sole expense of the Right Hon. John Frederick, first Earl of Cawdor, Stackpole Court."

It is signed by the then Rector, F. G. Leach.

RCAM The Parish Church dedicated to St Pedrog

The plan of this Church shows a chancel 18ft by 11 ft, nave 33 ft by 16ft north transept 10 ½ ft by 10 ft, west tower and south porch. The chancel is modern. The nave and north transept are both vaulted. On the north side of the nave is a blocked doorway; the south door has a pointed arch. The windows and font are modern. The tower is of three storeys, with corbel table and battlements. The belfrey chamber has a shallow dome rising to the level of the battlements. Above the east end of the nave is a double Bell cote, now empty. On the right of the chancel, and facing the nave is one of the few brasses in the county, commemorating William Lloyd , rector of the parish who died in 1674 – a rubbing is in the library of the Carmarthenshire Antiq. Society.

The Churchyard cross is modern, erected on an old base of four steps – visited 26th May 1922

The Lloyd Brass.

The William Lloyd brass on the South East wall in the Nave reads, (Translation)

[Here in hope of the Resurrection are deposited the remains of William Lloyd MA, Rector of the parochial Churches of St. Petrox and for some time most worthy Rector of Stackpole Elidor and Bosherston as well as excellent Prebendary Canon of the Cathedral Church of Menevia (St. Davids), and Surrogate Judge of its Consistory Court, (who married Dorothy, daughter of Ambrose Roop, knight of Little Dartmouth in the County of Devon, by whom he begot three sons and the same number of daughters, out of whom four, that is two sons and two daughters, are laid here near their father) who departed from life 12th. March 1674 at the age of 43.

“If you consider his lineage, noble,

His character, liberal,

His integrity, unstained,

His learning distinguished,

His religious practices, devout,

(Of a fine religious understanding, He embraced the externals and inner truths alike, just as he taught.)

His life, blameless,

In all, an example. Go on your way, by-passer, Considering, admiring and emulating the virtues for which the heavens envied lie earth.”]

Mansell Memorial is on the North wall of the Nave:-

There is a tablet with the following inscription:

In Memory of The Lady Jane Mansell of the ancient family of the Wyndhams.

She was first Married to Sir Roger Lort of Stackpole and afterwards to Sir Edward Mansell of Mudlescomb.

She lies hereby Interred nigh the relicts of her first Husband who made the following Epitaph.

(Translation).

“Here where in life I used to fulfil my devotions.

Here in this place I wished to lay my bones in death.

Here my bones await the Salvation procured by the death of Christ until the mind which must return to God shall enjoy (that Salvation).

My wife wished to have a sepulchre beside my own.

As in life, so may she be also in death my companion, she who alive was never a spouse ill-disposed to her Husband, nor wished to be faithless after death”.

Pritchatt Monument.

On the North wall under the tower there is a marble monument of generous proportions and careful phrasing to the memory of the Revd. Charles Picott Pritchett M.A. a former Rector of this Parish.

Cha[rls] Pigott Pritchett, Rural Dean of Pembroke, to William Stuart Bishop of St Davids:
Enclosed I have the honour to send your lordship the state of the contributions for the sons of the Clergy in my deanery to August 1794.

Sorry I am that this fund is a sinking one, notwithstanding my utmost exertion, not only by the falling off of many lay subscribers but even of brethren, whose duty and interest should have dictated different conduct to them.

..... I have 22 parishes in my district; six resident Clergy only, I believe, are at present to be found in the whole.

Enclosed is the following list of subscribers..... (inc)

The Devils Quoit or Sampson's Farm Stone

On the field known as East Hole Stone appurtenant to Sampson Farm is an erect stone. It rises 6 ½ ft clear of the ground and is rudely pointed.

This is one of the three stones locally known as the Devil's Quoits.

Single Standing Stones

On the south east face of the Sampson's Farm stone, St Petrox, are two circular hollows 12 inches apart the upper one 3 inches in diameter by three quarters of an inch deep, the lower on two and a half inches by half inch. the stone is an igneous rock, and the hollows, which stand out in contrast to the regular surface surrounding them, appear to have been artificially produced. The Standing Stones of Pembrokeshire (J M Lewis)

Fenton (Tours p418) records the tradition that the stones meet annually “to dance the Hay at a place called Sais's [the Saxon] Ford; and then the dance over resume their stations – visited 26th May 1922.

The second of the Devil Quoits is now in the yard of Stackpole Farm. It has a height of some 7ft above the soil – visited 26th May 1922

Roche Point or Shelter.

The peninsular immediately south of Stackpole Farm is bounded on either side by the narrow estuaries known as the Fishponds. On it says Fenton, in the process of digging out a fox, were found “human bones and a brazen spear head; and in the morass separating it from the encampment an old sword with a deer Horn handle (Tour 417) This latter object is now in the Tenby Museum visited 13th June 1922.

Special mention must be made of the Rev John H Richards of St Twynells Stackpole & St Petrox Rector of Bosherston parishes who kindly gave me permission to include the details from the parish registers which he had compiled

,St Twynnels St Gwynnog

St Twynnel is another local saint. The sturdy Church has been victorianised. Previously it had panels with ten commandments on behind the Altar.

Nearby is a large imposing Iron age camp.

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales - Twinnel's St.-- Lewis

TWINNEL'S (St.), a parish, in the hundred of Castlemartin, union and county of Pembroke, South Wales, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Pembroke; containing 234 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the southern part of the county, and comprises a considerable portion of inclosed and cultivated land, and a small tract of open downs affording good pasturage for sheep and young cattle. Limestone is found in it, and quarries have been opened, in the working of which some of the inhabitants are employed. The village is neatly built, on an eminence, and is of prepossessing appearance. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the King's Books at £3. 17. 11.; present net income, £150; patrons, the Dean and Chapter of St Davids. The tithes have been commuted for £184, of which £80 are payable to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford; a like sum to the vicar, who has also a glebe of 1½ acre, which, with a house, is valued at £10 per annum; and £24 to certain impropiators. The Church, is an ancient building, with a very lofty tower, and, from its elevated situation, is an interesting and conspicuous object from all parts of the surrounding country. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one or two Sunday schools are held

The Church of St Twynnels

A Long 13th century nave has a pointed tunnel-vault carried on the thick side walls. Remnants of the late 13th and 14th centuries are the small tower perched on the west wall, the south porch, the south transept with a squint and the arch of a former north transept.

There is a plain tablet to Katherine Owen of Orielton, died 1698.

RCAM St Twynnels Church

The Parish Church dedicated to St Gwynnog

In the Taxatio of 1291, this Church is described as Ecclesia Sancti Wynnoce

The building on plan consists of chancel 23ft by 14 ½ ft, nave 57ft by 16 ½ ft., south transept 13ft by 11ft, west tower 21ft square externally, and south porch. The chancel arch is modern, an enlargement of the earlier opening. A squint passage leads from the chancel to the south transept; the latter opens to the nave by a pointed arch. The nave has a plain vault. The tower is of three storeys, with corbel table and battlements. The Bell chamber is crowned by a dome rising only to the level of the battlements, like that at St Petrocs. In the south west Angle is a vice of 75 steps which rises clear of the battlements. The lighting is by plain slits, those of the belfrey having pointed arches. There is no west door. The porch is plain vaulted, has masonry seats and a stoup recess to the left on entering; the doorway has a pointed arch. The font basin is of cushion type 28 ins by 27 ins externally, 21 ins y 19 ins internally, with a height of 3ft from the level; on the edge are traces of a hinged and hasped cover. It stands upon a circular shaft and square base – visited 24th May 1922

Churchyard Cross

Pembrokeshire Parsons

In 1259 a Chapel-of-ease at Kylkermoran (Crickmarron Farm) is recorded. Nothing remains of it. The Church of St. Winnoc [St. Twinnel] was formerly part of the possessions of the priory of St. Nicholas, Pembroke and was by the prior and monks of that house, with the consent of the abbot of Seyes the patron of the Church, granted to Richard Carew Bishop of St Davids, who in 1260 appropriated it to the Canons resident of St David's Cathedral subject to a pension of one Mark, which the prior was wont to receive from the Church, and reserving to the Bishop the right of presenting the vicar thereto, and also subject to the Canons resident providing a competent endowment for that minister - this grant was to take effect on the death of William de Gogh, who was then the rector of St Twinnels. - Stat. Menevia.

William Gogh was rector in 1259, and this is the only record of an individual rector of this Church.

Described as Ecclesia Sancti Wynnoce, this Church was in 1291 assessed at £12 for tenths to the King, the sum payable being £1 4s. - Taxatio.

Clear yearly value, £24. King's Books, £3 17s. 11d. – Bacon's Liber Regis.

The earliest record of a lease of the tithes of this Church was on 4 April, 1554, when a lease for 40 years at a rent of £8 was granted to Henry Wyriott, gent., and George Wyriott, gent., both of Orielton, Pems. In July, 1565, George Wyriotte and his son and heir, John Wyriotte, obtained another lease for 40 years to commence from the termination of the proceeding lease at the same rent. In 1641 Mrs. Dorothy Owen, the mother of Sir Hugh Owen, held the tithes on land at the rent of £8 16s., and in 1661 a lease of them was granted for 21 years to Sir Hugh Owen, Bart., of Orielton. In 1662 Arthur Owen of Orielton, [the brother of Sir Hugh Owen] obtained a lease for 21 years at the same rent but the tenant was to make the vicars stipend equal to the tenants share. - Chapter Records.

From this date down till the year 1817 the tithes continued to be held by the Owen family under leases regularly renewed, the rent remaining at £10 during the whole period. In 1817

Sir John Owen, Bart., paid a fine of £80 for a new term of 21 years - Collectanea Menevensia.

On 24 March , 1851, the chapter afixed its seal to a certificate of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for a proposed exchange of the advowson of Henfynyw, for the advowson of the vicarage of Warren, Pems., with the view of uniting Warren with St. Twinnels - Chapter Acts

On 26 Dec., 1851, the vicarages of St. Twinnels and Warren were united under an Order in Council.

On 15 Mar., 1860, the vicar of St. Twinnels was authorized to borrow from Queen Annes Bounty to build a vicarage house. - Chapter Acts.

All presentations to the united vicarages of Warren with St. Twinnels are by the dean and chapter of St David's Cathedral.

Extract from a Letter from Cha[rle]s Pigott Pritchett, rural dean of Pembroke, to William Stuart Bishop of St Davids:

..... The state of the churches in my district is now become so decent and in tolerable order that it is unnecessary for me to trouble your lordship with particulars. I wish I had as good an account to give of many of the vicarage houses. That of Nangle stands in most deplorable condition, next to it Mannerbier, St Twinnels and the vicarage at Stackpole want thorough repairs.
Church in Wales MS AD/AET 1209. Pembrokeshire life 1572 - 1843.

Altar rails originated in the time of William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury. He was a stickler for order and dignity in public worship, and his influence on the Church of England was profound. It seems to have been customary in those days for dogs to accompany their owners to Church. To ensure that dogs should not foul the altar, Laud decreed that rails should be erected to protect the sanctuary of the Church from their wanderings. Few modern altar rails would serve the purpose. Those at St Twynnells would certainly keep straying canines away. They still would not meet the Archbishops specifications, however. He decreed that the railings should be erected along three sides of the altar area.

This Church is a Grade II listed building

Stackpole Elidor,

A quiet and very beautiful corner of Pembrokeshire, centred on the old Stackpole Estate. Stackpole Court has been demolished in 1963 after being used by the military during WW2,

The Estate is now owned by the National Trust. The Church is at Stackpole Elidor, just over half a mile away. Nearby are deep wooded valleys, the Bosherston Lily Ponds, the charming little harbour of Stackpole Quay, and the remote and lovely sandy beach of Barafundle Bay.

1839 Stackpool-Elidur Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

Stackpool-Elidur, a parish, in the hundred of Castlemartin, union and county of Pembroke, South Wales, 3½ miles (S.) from Pembroke; containing 294 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the Stack rock at the mouth of the Broad Haven (at the head of which it is situated) in the Bristol Channel; and its adjunct from St. Elidur, to whom the original foundation of its Church is attributed. The parish comprises an extensive tract of good arable and pasture land, in a high state of cultivation; and the scenery, enriched with the beautiful grounds and plantations surrounding the mansion of Stackpool Court, is finely diversified and strikingly picturesque. Stackpool Court, the property and one of the seats of Earl Cawdor (of which the park is in this parish, and the house and grounds in that of St. Petrox), is romantically situated in a deep and well-wooded valley, ornamented with an artificial lake, over which is an elegant stone bridge of eight arches. A noble mansion, which overlooked the lake, was erected by the great grandfather of Earl Cawdor, and son of Sir Alexander Campbell, who was the first of the family that settled in Wales, and who, by marriage with Miss Lort, the heiress, became possessed of the estate. This edifice, however, has been almost entirely rebuilt by his lordship, from a plan designed by the late Sir Jeffrey Wyatville; and Stackpool Court has been rendered one of the most superb residences in the principality. It is built of hewn limestone, and presents an imposing grandeur of appearance, having two spacious and magnificent fronts: along the whole of that facing the lake, a wide terrace has been formed, from which is a delightful prospect; and from the other front, containing the entrance, is a view of the pleasure-grounds. The interior comprises a splendid suite of apartments, and a library consisting of a large collection of valuable works in every department of literature. The gardens are laid out with taste, and the greenhouses and hothouses are stored with rare exotics; the park, which is well stocked with deer, is very extensive, and in the grounds is a large conservatory: the approach to the house has been much increased in beauty by the erection of a new bridge of one arch. The whole of this fine property has been greatly improved by the present proprietor; and the estate, which includes not less than fifteen thousand acres of rich land, in the highest state of cultivation, with its luxuriant woods and plantations, forms a distinguished ornament to this part of the county.

The living is a rectory, with that of St. Petrox, rated in the King's Books, and endowed with £600 royal bounty; income, £447. The Church, dedicated to St. Elidur, or, according to some authorities, to St. James, is an ancient structure, containing several monuments to different members of the family of Stackpool Court, among which is one, under a rich sculptured canopy of stone, bearing the effigy of a crusader, said to represent Sir Elidur de Stackpool, the earliest known proprietor of that estate, and the reputed founder of the Church. The interior was richly embellished by an ancestor of Earl Cawdor, in 1766. In the park is a day school, under the patronage of the Earl and Countess Cawdor; and a Sunday School is held in the Church. On a tongue of land commanding a branch of the Stackpool estuary is a strong encampment, near which have been found human bones in several places, a brazen spear-head, and an old sword; probably memorials of some of those conflicts that frequently took place along this coast, between the natives and the invaders of their country.

Stackpole. Edwards, Emily Hewlett 1910

Stackpole was a place-name before the advent of Arnulph de Montgomery. It is mentioned as Ystang Bwl in the Will of Cadifor Vawr, who died just before the Normans invaded Wales.

Giraldus Cambrensis tells the story of Sir Elidor de Stackpole's demon steward, who appeared to be a red-headed young man named Simon; he seized the keys of the previous steward, usurped the position, and performed his duties wonderfully well; he produced, as if by magic, any dish privately desired by his master and mistress, knew all their secrets, divined where the knight's treasure was concealed, and even upbraided his employers for storing instead of using and enjoying their riches; he fed the servants sumptuously, and for forty days everyone was happy. Although Simon did not sleep in the house he was always at his post in the morning, but alas! he never went to Church, and not one Catholic word did he utter! It was discovered that he held nightly converse by a mill and pond of water. Sir Elidor and his lady, on hearing this, demanded the keys, which he gave up, confessing himself to be the son of a peasant woman begotten by a demon who took the shape of her Husband. The mother corroborated his story, and the poor devil was dismissed.

The old Castle of Stackpole forms a nucleus round which clusters the 18th century mansion; the original Hall with groined and vaulted roof, is now used as a cellar.

Stackpoles, Vernons, Lorts and Campbells have in turn been lords of Stackpole.

Edwards, Emily Hewlett Castles and strongholds of Pembrokeshire Tenby 1909

Stackpole Court was actually listed as being in the parish of St. Petrox and the two parishes were united in 1839

Note – in the Life of St. Teilo included in the Book of Llan Dav, the Saint is said to have been known also as Eliud, and it is certain that all the Pembrokeshire churches dedicated to Elidyr lie within the district covered by Teilo's activities. It is doubtful whether St. Elidyr ever existed and it is probable that the name is due to a scribe who finished off the form Elid with a flourish which was taken by a later copyist as the ordinary contraction for -er or or. At a still later date he appears in medieval genealogy as Sir Elidore, a knight of the holy sepulchre, and the stock-parent of a long line of Pembrokeshire families

By - and - by we come to Cheriton (Stackpole Cheriton); a tiny hamlet with a comely Church, whose tall, ivy -clad tower rises from a wooded dell. In the Church-yard stands an ancient cross smothered in creepers, and the stepping-block for those who rode to Church in bygone days.

In the north wall of the chancel, beneath a handsome, canopied recess of somewhat unusual character, lies the effigy of its reputed founder. Sir Elidin de Stackpole.

The figure has a grave and dignified appearance ; it is clad in a suit of chain-and-plate mail, and has sword, shield and large spurs. The worthy knight is represented with crossed legs, as having fought in the wars of the Crusades ; at the time, no doubt, when Baldwyn and Gerald of Manorbere were inciting the people to that famous enterprise.

The base of this monument is divided into six panels, in each of which is a figure beneath a cusped and crocketed arch. These quaint little effigies show a curious variety of costume and expression, and are worth close examination. Upon the opposite, or southern, side of the chancel is the figure of a lady, apparently of Edwardian date. The head is covered with a square Hood, and is supported by two kneeling angels. This effigy is very well executed, and in an unusually good state of preservation.

In the adjacent chantry- we notice the early- seventeenth-century monument of ' Roger Lorte, late Lorde of the Mannor of StackPoole.' This singular erection is enriched with the painted figures of Sir Roger his lady, and their twelve children, and bears a pious inscription in the peculiar style of the period. Under the window of this chantry- lies a disused altar stone bearing the following inscription, which we respect-fully submit for antiquaries to exercise their wits upon : CAMU ORIS

Hard beneath the Church we plunge into a woodland path, and follow the meanderings of a prattling brook which hurries along, beneath the cool shade of overarching trees, to the lake-like river that irts the broad demesne of Stackpole Court.

The variety and luxuriance of the forest trees that flourish in this sheltered locality, are all the more striking in a country where well-developed timber is, as a rule, conspicuous by its absence ; for the rigorous gales that sweep across the more exposed uplands, give to the struggling vegetation that leeward slant which is a characteristic of many a Pembrokeshire landscape.

Pleasant it is, turning from the glare of the dusty roadway, to saunter beneath these leafy aisles of smooth-stemmed beech and knotty oak, mountain-Ash, ilex and Scotch fir ; and to push our way through intertwining thickets of bramble, wild-rose and ivy, enmeshed by the clinging woodbine and traveller's joy ; while all the time the mercury, in less-favoured spots, is climbing steadily towards the eighties.

Crossing a rustic bridge that spans the lake, we pause to watch the slim, brown trout darting in every direction beneath the water-lilies that adorn its placid surface ' , when, suddenly, a brace of dusky waterfowl, alarmed by our intrusion, dart off with an impetuous splash and trail away in rapid flight to the shelter of the ozier-beds.

Ere long the broad, Gray front of Stackpole Court comes into view beyond a stretch of velvety greensward ; the massive porch being flanked by two small Spanish field-guns of antiquated pattern, bearing the titles ' La Destruidora ' and ' La Tremenda.' The existing mansion was built by an ancestor of the present Lord Cawdor, upon the site of the baronial residence of that same Sir Elidur de Stackpole, whose tomb we have so lately seen at Cheriton.

The older house had experienced a chequered career. After weathering many troubles in mediaeval times, it was garrisoned by the King's troops during the Civil Wars : when its stout old walls offered such effective resistance to the Parliamentary Cannon, that they did but little execution.

Stackpole is now the residence of the noble ' Thane of Cawdor,' whose ancestor acquired the estate by marriage with Miss Lort, the sole heiress to all these broad acres.

The mansion contains some interesting works of art and relics of antiquity, including a portrait by Romney of the famous Lady Hamilton; a fine painting of Admiral Sir George Campbell, G.C.B., who captured the French invaders at Fishguard in 1797; and a curious old map of the county, adorned with shields and armorial devices.

That famous drinking-cup the ' Hirlas Horn ' was formerly to be seen at Stackpole, but has since been removed to Golden Grove, in Carmarthenshire. This curious treasure is mounted in silver, and is supported upon an oval plinth by two silver quadrupeds. The latter are probably the only remaining portions of the original Horn, presented by Henry of Richmond to his faithful entertainer, Dafydd ap JEvan, while resting at the Castle of Llwyn Dafydd, in Cardiganshire, on his way to Bosworth Field.

Upon faring forth again, we are struck with admiration of the splendid groups of evergreen trees that adorn the vicinity of the mansion, and the trim, well-tended grounds that contrast so pleasantly with the wild luxuriance of the surrounding woodlands.

At the neighbouring farm we pick up a track diverging to the left, that leads us over a bridge spanning the lake-like estuary-, affording a pretty peep of the mansion upon its bank. Thence our path winds across the breezy slopes of Stackpole Park, until we drop suddenly upon tiny Quay and cluster of cottages, stowed away beside the sea in the oddest corner imaginable, under the sheltering lee of the cliffs. Ensconced in this out-of-the-way nook, we snatch a well-earned fiesta; and upon resuming our stroll we follow the coast-line, passing near a cavern that goes by the name of Lort's Cave, and catching a glimpse of the secluded cove of Barrafundle, backed by a stretch of blue sea and the bold crags of Stackpole Head.

1811 Fenton, Tours Ancient Village

I cross an arm of the estuary of Stackpole, under a tongue of land covered with a strong encampment, and well placed to command the inlet it fronts, and ascend a gentle slope near the summit of which is a small adit or cavern in the limestone rock; here, in digging for a fox, were found human bones and a brazen spear head; and in the morass separating it from the encampment, an old sword with a deer Horn handle. In levelling some inequalities on the flat to the eastwards of the camp, they were found to consist of human bones, probably the spot where a skirmish between the invaders and natives might have taken place. Indeed the whole neighbourhood, from many striking traditions and other circumstances, appears to have been the scene of frequent and bloody contests.

1923 RCAM in Wales- Prehistoric antiquities of Stackpole

The following note (MS in Tenby Museum) by the late Mr Edward Laws, F.S.A on the prehistoric antiquities of Stackpole, forms an admirable introduction to the account of this parish.

“On the Warren, a tract of blown sand lying between Stackpole Court and the sea (by the arm of which it was formerly intersected) there are certain lines of stones resembling the foundations of walls, huts etc. last so narrow that they never could have been more than 2ft or 3ft high. These are known as the Prehistorical Village. In the immediate vicinity, and for some distance around are large numbers of flint flacks and cores, among which are a few perfect implements have been found. In the neighborhood as many round barrows, how many is impossible to say as they are hidden by the shifting sand; from one of these came a broken earthenware and charred bone. Near at hand in a cave, was found a bronze sword handle with unburnt animal and human bones, and on the surface of the sand a bronze fibula was once picked up. There are three menhirs not far off, the nearest being about 500yds from the village. Well made Pottery and iron slag are found on the blown sand, proving that this settlement was not overwhelmed by the sand and deserted until after the Iron Age had commenced. It is remarkable as being the most eastern flint factory in Pembrokeshire; these occur at short intervals along the coast from Stackpole to the northern part of the county, at Brownsdale, Dale, St Brides and Llanwnda.

Stackpole Warren 'ANCIENT Village'

An enclosure complex, extending about 120m NNW-SSE by 60m, the various features being defined by low (up to 0.4m high) stony banks; at the centre of the complex, as mapped by RCAM (1979), is a circular structure, some 8.0m across, opening into a roughly 17.5m diameter enclosure on the east: examination of the latter enclosure showed that it had been constructed over an earlier shell-midden (Benson 1978); the site has produced much worked flint, along with iron-slag & possibly spindlewhorls: the complex, occupying a north-facing promontory, can apparently be linked to a wider pattern of relict field enclosure, although this is not certain (Benson et al. 1990, 208).

Stackpole - Mrs Mary Mirehouse.

Stackpole Vernon. Stanley. Lort. Campbell. Owners.

Sir Richard Stackpole, knighted by William the Conqueror, married Margaret, daughter of Sir

Richard Tuberville of Glamorgan, and lived at Stackpole, now called Stackpole Court, but not so in the older records. He was succeeded by his brother Robert, whose son, Sir William, married a daughter of Hywel ap Ithel, Lord of Roos, and commanded troops under King Stephen; he was defeated by King David in the Battle of the Standards in 1138.

William's son, Sir Richard, married a daughter of Henry Vernon of Haddon, and his son was Sir Elidor, who went to the Crusades with King Richard I. in 1169, and whose tomb and effigy are in Cheriton Church. He married Elsbeth, daughter of Sessylt ap Llewellyn ap Mereddig, and their daughter, Elsbeth, became heiress of Stackpole. Elsbeth married Sir Rhys, an old Knight of War; then followed Grufudd, then Rhys ap Grufudd (Welsh names introduced by the old Knight of War !), then a daughter, Sioned (or Joanet), who married William Vernon of Harliston in Staffordshire, son of Sir Richard Vernon. She died in 1368, and her son, Sir Richard Vernon, succeeded. He married Benedicta, sister and heiress of Sir Fulk Pemburge (?) of Pemburge Castle, and of Tong, in Staffordshire. He was living at Stackpole in 1400, but there is no trace of Vernons resident there later.

Then followed Sir William Vernon, Constable of England for life, he died 1467; then another Sir William, who married Margaret, daughter of Lord Ferrers, and was Lord of Haddon (Haddon Hall in Derbyshire). Then Sir Henry, Governor and Treasurer to Prince Arthur, son of Henry VII.; he fought at Bosworth Field in 1485. After him came Sir Richard, who died 1518; then Sir George, called "the King of the Peak", from his extravagant hospitality.

He died 1565 and left two daughters, co-heiresses; of whom Dorothy eloped with Sir John Manners, son of the Duke of Rutland, and took Haddon as her portion, and Margaret married Sir Thomas Stanley, son of the Earl of Derby, and took Stackpole and Tong. She appointed as her steward at Stackpole, George Lort, son of John Lort of Knowlden, Staffordshire, who was born about 1530.

He, in Lady Stanley's lifetime, changed from steward to owner, probably by purchase.

George Lort's son Roger, born about 1555, married Abertha, daughter of his father's second wife, who was the widow of Hugh Bwrrw. Roger was Sheriff in 1607, and died 1613. There is a quaint verse on his tomb in the Memorial Chapel at CHenton Church:

Worne out with lingering sickness here I lye,
My body rather, whence my soul did Eye,
As out of prison to Heavens joyes,
Make these sure, reder, all things els are toyed.

Henry Lort succeeded in 1613, and was Sheriff in 1619. He had three sons: Roger, who succeeded to Stackpole, Henry, of Prickeston (now a farm on the Stackpole estate), and Sampson, of East Moor, Manorbier. Henry died in 1646, and Roger succeeded, who took a very leading part in the Parliamentary wars on Cromwells side; he was a most bitter opponent of Rowland Laugharne and John Poyer, the gallant defenders of Pembroke Castle in the great siege. They on one occasion caught Roger with White and others, at - Henllan, near Pwllcrochan, and besieged them there; but they contrived to escape. Roger was Sheriff in 1652, and was created Baronet by Charles II. In 1662; he died in 1664, and his son John succeeded, whose wife was Lady Susanna Holles, daughter of the Earl of Ware. Their only son, Gilbert, died in 1698, and his sister Elizabeth became heiress of Stackpole; she was then a widow, having married Sir Alexander Campbell of Calder, or Cawdor, in Nairnshire, in 1688, who had died in 1697. The eldest son of Sir Alexander Campbell and Elizabeth Lort, Gilbert, died young; the second, John, succeeded his mother at Stackpole, and his grandfather at Cawdor in 1716. He married Mary , daughter and co-heiress of Lewis Pryse of Gogerddan; he was Lord of the Admiralty and afterwards of the Treasury. He added to, and improved the mansion at Stackpole and made the library. His eldest son, Pryse, predeceased him, having married Sarah, daughter of Sir Edmund Bacon; their son John succeeded his grandfather in 1777. He married Lady Catherine Howard, daughter of the Earl of Carlisle, and was made Baron Cawdor of Castlemartin in 1796. He died in 1821, his son, John Frederick, was made Earl in 1827, and married Lady Elizabeth Thynne, daughter of the Marquess of Bath; he died in 1860. John Frederick Vaughan, his son, married Sarah Mary , daughter of General the Hon.

Henry Compton Cavendish (she was Maid of Honour to Queen Victoria); he died in 1898, and was succeeded by his son the third Earl.

Early 1800s John Campbell (later Lord Cawder) of Stackpole and John Mirehouse of Brownslade drained huge marshes and converted them into fruitful grain growing fields and improved the breeds of cattle and sheep.

Early Stackpole House

Earlier house was fortified and garrisoned for the King in the Civil War besieged 1644. It is said that the walls were so strong that the ordinance did but little execution but the Parliamentarians succeeded in making a breach and the small garrison surrendered after eight hours siege.

18c Stackpole Court : This mansion was built in 1735- 54 on the undercroft of the earlier house. Alexander Campbell heir to Cawdor Castle in Scotland married Elizabeth Lort, heiress to Stackpole Court. Alexander was up at Cambridge with Elizabeth's brother Gilbert Lort and used to stay at Stackpole for a night or two before taking ship up the west coast to Fort William. On one occasion he was storm bound for several weeks and romance blossomed.

Stackpool Court (spelling according to Fenton from Ancient MS and other ancient Documents)

1811 Tours Fenton

Stackpool Court, the elegant seat of Loer Cawder, undoubtedly took its name, and so I find it noted in a MS I have had access to in the Bodleian library, from the Stack rock at the mouth of the pool or estuary of Broadhaven, at the head of which it stands.

The house is situated on the western side of the water, on a fine eminence at the edge of a bold declivity, and before it yielded to the present noble edifice , had a partly castellated form, though it had been for a century before, by every addition and alteration it experienced, gradually losing its ancient and original baronial character and moulding itself to the fashion of the times. However there can be no doubt of its retaining much of its Castle strength and massiveness at the time of the civil wars, as it was fortified and garrisoned for the King; for in an account given by the parliamentary forces of the siege, they say "the walls were so strong that the ordinance did but little execution," it surrendered on quarter and sixty soldiers completely armed were found in the house. The mansion now occupying the same site, of wrought limestone was built by the grandfather of the present noble possessor, who was the son of Sit Alexander Campbell of Cawder Castle in Scotland , the first of the name who settled here by marrying Miss Lort, the sole heiress of this great property.

Though there have been objections to the heaviness of its architecture, it is a large and magnificent pile and well adapted to its site. It had two fronts, the principal facing the pleasure grounds and the grand approach; the other looking over a fine piece of water at the foot of the slope it stands on to the park.. you enter the latter from a terrace of great breadth, extending the length of it, and after descending a flight of steps continued on a lower level the whole length of a spacious conservatory, furnished with a choice collection of the rarest shrubs and plants. On the opposite side is the park, of great compass, and well stocked with deer, but wanting a belt of trees to hide the barren sand banks without it, and produce shelter where most wanted by breaking the sea breeze; and otherwise deficient in wood, though that defect from the numerous young thriving plantations everywhere judiciously scattered, is likely soon to be obviated . The hills skirting the lake on the house , and forming its boundary, are richly wooded in every direction, as are the pleasure grounds and shrubbery in front, beyond which, but completely hidden , are the gardens, including the hot houses on an immense Scale. Between the park and the sea there is a Warren consisting of a vast tract of burrows formed by mountains of sand consolidated by that valuable plant sea weed grass; abounding with rabbits, a valuable appendage to a great mans residence, which, though to shut it out by a screen of foliage from the view, might be desirable, yet no one could wish to have it removed.

A charming piece of water admirably planned now fills the Valle under the house, which, till this change of late years took place, crept an inconsiderable stream choaked with reeds and osiers all the way to the place where it felt and was lost in, the tide. The dam for altering the level, necessary to unite the water, is happily hidden under the elegant bridge of eight arches, connecting the grounds on the side of the mansion with the park. The lake is most abundantly stocked with aquatic wild fowl of every sort, if wild they may be called, that collect at a call, and come in flocks to dry land to be fed like barn door poultry. It has been justly remarked, that nothing gives such enjoyment on the generous minds of its possessors, as the sight of the commoners of the wild, looking up to them for security and protection; and so far domesticated as not to seem impatient of more limited liberty, clearly shown by flocking to the hands of their benefactors, with fearless confidence to receive their bounty, and as it were, to acknowledge and repay it.

The house is distributed into a number of very noble apartments, and the library is large and well furnished. In one of the rooms hung round with family pictures, there is a portrait whole length of Lord Cawdor, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; and of Lady Cawdor, by Sir William Beechey; and, in an adjoining room an original portrait of the late Lord Holland. The offices are all well arranged, and the stables form a detached large quadrangular building, are in a style of princely pretensions.

Of Stackpole without straining compliment, it may safely be said that there are few places which display more magnificence without, or more sumptuous hospitality and elegant comforts within. This, like all the baronial residences in the county, had its mill, an inseparable appendage, on the little stream below it, though long since swept away; but of which Giraldous has left a memorable record, as connected with a most ludicrous story he relates. But to sum up the importance of Stackpole, it stands in the midst of a contiguous property of fifteen thousand acres of the most valuable land, without the intervention of one incapable of cultivation.

The first Possessor of Stackpole we hear of, was Sir Elidur or Leonard de Stackpole, who stands at the head of all the pedigrees of his name: the same who Giraldus mentions, and aho, no doubt, took the cross at the time Baldwin made his transit through this county preaching the Crusade. From him not more than two descents were cast before the great possessions of this family fell among daughters the co-heiresses of Sir Richard Stackpole, one of whom Joan, who had Stackpole as her share, married Sir Richard Vernon, of Hodnet in Staffordshire. Whilst the estate remained in that name, I do not find any of them resided in the old Baronial Mansion, nor do we find it regularly inhabited again till after the year 1536 (for then the Vernons owned it, and we find that William Latymer was presented, by letters patent, to the parish Church of Stackpole, lapsing to the King by reason of the minority of George Vernon about which time the Lorts got possession of it, but whether by marriage or purchase I knew not; in it the family of Lorts continued till its union with that of Campbell, in the person of Sir Alexander Campbell, whose great grandson, Lord Cawder, now enjoys it.

The seat of the Earl of Cawder. The present mansion is largely reared upon the undercroft of an earlier house, and has preserved an example of ribbed barrel vaulting similar to that in Monkton Old Hall.

In Addl MSS 1352 B of the National Library of Wales is an interesting reference to the erection of the present residence:--

“John Wright ((alias Gil Blas) bailiff to Pryse Campbell writing on the 17th October 1735 says ' Rebuilding of Stackpole. Since the pulling down of the old house the rats that used to run behind the wainscot in the study are gone abroad. The court is full of stones for the building and slates to cover the house' “

Fenton (Tours p418) gives the following account of the earlier house which – Before it yielded to the present noble edifice, had partly a castellated form though it had been for a century before, by every addition and alteration it experienced, gradually losing its ancient and original baronial character, and moulding itself to the fashion of the times. However, there can be no doubt of its retaining much of its Castle strength and massiveness at the times of the civil wars, as it was fortified and garrisoned for the King; for in the account given by the Parliamentary forces of the siege, they say “the walls were so strong that the ordinance did but little execution” it surrendered on quarter, and sixty soldiers completely armed were found in the house. The mansion now occupying the site, of wrought limestone, was built by the grandfather of the present noble possessor, who was son of Alexander Campbell, of Cawder Castle in Scotland, the first of the name who settled here by marrying Miss Lort the sole heiress of this great property.

A relic of Sir Roger Lort, author of a book of Latin epigrams remains at Stackpole in the shape of a leaden cistern, which bears the initials R.I. and the date 1659. In the Hall is a stand of arms taken from the French by Lord Cawdor on the occasion of the landing at Fishguard.

Two pieces of ordinance, dated 1754 and 1757, Solano Fecit, doubtless wreckage from a ship of war, stand on the lawns in front of the House.

Stackpole Court, Stackpole

Stackpole Court was situated 500m to the west of Stackpole village (the other side of the lake), off a minor road running towards Merrion. Stackpole, which was the seat of the Campbell family (Lords of Cawdor in Scotland), was a large mansion built in 1735-6, and enlarged in the 19th century. It was built upon the undercroft of a much earlier house, the original Hall of which, with a groined and vaulted roof, was later used as a cellar.

The Stackpoles had owned the estate since the early 12th century and the old castellated house may date from the 13th century or before. There are references to a house here owned by the Stackpools by Gerald of Wales in 1188. From the mid-16th century the estate was owned by the Lort family, and later passed to the Campbells by marriage in the early 18th century. The mansion was demolished in April 1963, after Cawdor had taken out the best internal features and moved them to a new house he had built on the Estate the previous year. RCAHMS, February 2011

Stackpole Court, Garden, Stackpole

Parklands & Gardens of Wales

Large estate which includes deerpark, Warren, fishponds, obelisk, gasometer and massive kitchen garden. House demolished c 1972. In the care of the National Trust.

Stackpole Court

This site, in multiple ownership, including the National Trust, includes many complex and important garden and landscaped features, though its main original focus, a large mid-eighteenth (1758-1782) to nineteenth-century mansion was demolished 1962-72.

Its parks, gardens, lakes and woodlands were developed and continuously improved to create a sophisticated and beautiful ornamental landscape on a huge Scale from the early eighteenth century. At its zenith this estate probably rivalled the best estates of Britain, with its strategically placed walks, 80 acres of lakes, bridges, weirs and grottos, all complemented by thoughtful and innovative planting. The surviving water features remain a particularly important feature of the site. The house's original terrace and balustrading survives. The brick-walled kitchen garden is one of the largest in the county, though this has unfortunately lost most of its older conservatories. CSB 12.04

This garden is depicted on the Second Edition Ordnance Survey 25-inch map of Pembrokeshire XLIII, sheet 5 (1908). Its main elements on that map include river, sundial, kennel, gasometer, woodland with vista paths, Smithy, walled garden, parkland, relict hedgelines, quadrangular enclosure, parterres, boathouse, pond, saw mills, woodland, icehouse, isolated geometric copses, conservatory, dam, deerpark, walk, possible walk, waterfall, covert, haw haw, well, lodge, greenhouse, obelisk, bridge, terrace, carriage drive, weir and a possible formal garden.

Eight Arched Bridge, Stackpole Court

The bridge at Stackpole Court was built in 1797 to connect Stackpole Court and the Home Farm with the New Deer Park and Stackpole Quay. It consists of eight segmental arches of limestone masonry built over a weir., RCAHMW, 2007

Stackpole Quay

Stackpole Quay extends approximately north-south for some 40m. The present 18th century masonry structure replaces an earlier Quay dating to 1680 which was used to land coal dust from nearby Saundersfoot. The Quay was used to ship out limestone from nearby qauries and to bring in luxury goods for Stackpole Court. Associated structures includes a boathouse and stores , a warehouse and a lime kiln . Now owned by the National Trust, the Quay and small harbour it protects are still used by small local fishing boats RCAHMW, December 2012.

Stackpole Quay Cottages, Stackpole

These cottages are just back from the south-end of the harbourside in Stackpole Quay, along a track. They are a pair of 19th century estate cottages, built by the Cawdor Estate. They closely resemble the plan published in 1869 by Lord Cawdor for cottages costing about £132 to build. There are hints that this pair is a recasting of an earlier building: as one of the front doorways may be secondary; there is a hint of a blocked central window to the rear wall of the main block; and one gable contains an oven (fired from a lean-to outside) in an excessively thick wall. There also appears to be a building on the site on the OS 1st Edition 25" to the mile map of 1865, though of a different plan, whilst by the 1908 revision, the plan is the same as the current cottages. The walls are of rendered rubble and there is a slate roof with chimneys of squared limestone with a projecting gap. All the windows are small-paned sashes (modern copies of the originals), except the dairy windows, which have closely spaced diamond stanchions. The first floor is lit by gabled dormers., RCAHMW, 22nd March 2005

Stackpole Quay Farm, Stackpole

Stackpole Quay Farm lies at the north end of Stackpole Quay, to the north-east of the limestone quarry and kiln . It is one of the Cawdor Estate farms: a large altered farmhouse (possibly with an early core), surrounded by a small 'model farm' courtyard of outbuildings. The house is aligned roughly north-south, with the west façade a very plain 19th century front, with limewashed rubble walls and a slate roof, sash windows below flat wooden lintels and rubble chimneys. The north gable has a small rounded oven in the corner by the rear extension, and the extension has brick dressings to the windows. The gabled rear wing probably predates it, but has been altered. The long east-west wing is later. The interior has been considerably altered, particularly in the southern half of the house. At the north end there is a deep open fireplace with a rough wooden bressummer, with an oven to one side and a copper (possibly in a former oven) to the other. The partition wall formerly had two doorways, one of which was blocked by the wooden staircase (now removed) and its embrasure used for a small fireplace. A modern blockwork wall divided the building in two (possibly replacing a former solid stone partition). 2 doorways lead into the rear dairy: a square-headed opening from the north room and a cambered arch from the south room. A similar cambered arch indicates the division between the 2 halves of the dairy. The southern half has a deep fireplace in the gable (partly blocked), and a doorway to the outbuildings next to it. The 1st floor of the north half indicates some of the alterations: north of the partition, the roof has been raised by about 60cm, and new trusses with plain pegged collars, put in. The chimney breast is stepped back to the west, and there is a low blocked doorway to the east, suggesting this may have been a granary or servant's quarters with Independent access. Under the roof, at the junction of the main wing and the gabled rear wing (where the ground plans show a solid block of masonry), there appears to be the base of a shouldered chimney-stack. This may indicate the former presence of a lateral stack. South of the partition is one of the higher-level trusses of the rest of the building, with chamfered notched lapped collars pegged to the principal rafters, with the apex halved. It may be that a small 17th century house with a lateral chimney was added to by a long extension in the 18th century, the old building being relegated to kitchen plus granary-loft, and a new fireplace and oven built. Later, in the nineteenth century, the building may have been divided into 2 dwellings, with the roof of the old part being raised. RCAHMW, 22nd March 2005

Stackpole Quay Stores, Stackpole

19th century stone building for Quay.

This building is at the south-end of the harbourside in Stackpole Quay, opposite Stackpole Quay Boathouse and Stores . It is a ruined shell of a building, with the front wall of limestone rubble with quoins and door-jambs in dressed limestone. The rear wall is a battered (wider at the bottom than the top) revetment, or retaining wall, to the roadway behind. Formerly, the doorways were closed by large single-leaf gates. Comparison with other store-buildings suggests that the material stored (possibly lime from the nearby Kiln was tipped in through high-level doorway-chutes from the upper road, and then loaded onto carts through the front doors for transport to the Quay for shipment. The building may date from the second half of the nineteenth century as it does not appear to be present on the OS 1st Edition 25" to the mile map of 1865, but is by the time of the 1908 revision. RCAHMW, 22nd March 2005

Stackpole Quay Boathouse And Store, Stackpole

19th century store buildings for Quay.

This building is at the south-end of the harbourside in Stackpole Quay. It is a large 'boathouse' plus a smaller attached store (possibly for coal/culm or lime - from the nearby Lime Kiln [NPRN: 40732]), within an enclosure wall. The boathouse appears to be the first building, with walls of random limestone rubble with a patching of bricks in the gable. It has a wide doorway with a wooden lintel. The attached store also has random rubble walls, with ashlar jambs to the doorways in the rear wall, at the level of the higher track running behind the complex. These may have been used for tipping in the material for storage. The front wall has been substantially rebuilt and the enclosing wall altered. RCAHMW, 22nd March 2005

Loading Berth, Stackpole Farm Quarry

The presence of a crane on the cliff top on the southern side of the quarry with no obvious trackway associated with it suggests that the products of this quarry were taken away by marine transport. RCAHMW, March 2012.

Quarry, Stackpole Quay Farm

A former quarry is suggested by the squared shaped of the inlet and by the presence of a crane on the cliff top on the southern side (as shown on OS 1st edition 25in mapping). RCAHMW, March 2012.

Lime Kiln, Stackpole Quay

A well-preserved eighteenth century lime kiln is located on the south side of the hamlet of Stackpole Quay, immediately inland from the harbour. The structure is built against rising ground on the east and is of roughly coursed, mortared, undressed rubble with dressed quoins. It measures

7.92m long (N-S) by 5.9m wide at ground level, excluding buttresses which support all three walls. It is 4m high to the top of the parapet which is 0.9m high above the loading platform. The top of the kiln is accessed via an inclined track from the south. The charging hole, now grilled over, is 2.75m (9 feet) in diameter.

The kiln has two opposed draw-holes, 2.2m wide, 2.95m deep and 1.6m high. Each has a narrow slot at its rear allowing access/viewing into the charge hole. To the rear of the kiln is an extensive quarry face. Limestone is also believed to have been brought by boat from other locations, including the promontory of Flimston Castle.

Two stone outbuildings (one of which is now a National Trust lavatory) lie close by on the east. These are not shown on the first edition OS 1:2500 mapping. David Leighton, RCAHMS, 24 February 2009

Stackpole Parish Church Fenton, Tours 1811

I descended to a Valle , where a private gate was unlocked, leading through a woody avenue to the Church of Cheriton, or as is sometimes called Stackpole Elidur, from its founder, which stands at the head of this sequestered dell. The Church is a plain building but with a tower consisting of a nave and chancel, having two small aisles on the south side, one occupied by the family pew, and the other entered from the chancel, the family burying place; and on the north side a little aisle taking up the area of the steeple built over it. On the north side of the chancel under a wrought canopy of stone , lies a cross legged knight, his right hand on his sword and his left bearing his shield, evidently once painted over with his arms; and there can be no doubt of it representing Elidur de Stackpole. The sides of the tomb are in compartments, each compartment containing a figure, but so disfigured by White wash, with which the champion of the cross, as well as every other part of the monument , has been plastered and replastered, that nothing of their character or design can be made out. On the south side of the chancel, but not under a canopy, is the effigy of a lady, well executed in a hard yellowish stone , in a very singular costume, particularly the head dress. In the family mausoleum are two monuments of a more recent date; and in the belfry aisle two effigies, with the clerical habit and tonsure, one uninscribed, and the other with an inscription too illegible to identify the dead.

Royal Commission on Ancient Monuments of Wales Stackpole Elidur St James & St Elidyr Parish of Stackpole

[Note-- The churches called after Elidyr are known in at least three cases to be “Teilo” churches from the Book of Llan Dav. Elidyr is perhaps another form of Teilo otherwise known as Eliud. Brown Willis only mentions St James. Lewis states that authorities differ saying that some saying St Elidyr, and others St James: Rees has “Elidyr and St James” (Church Plate of Pembrokeshire, J. T. Evans 1905)

On plan this building is cruciform having nave 57ft by 19ft, chancel 21 ½ ft by 14 ½ ft, a south (the Lort) Chapel 16 ½ ft. by 15ft, south transept 14ft by 11 ½ ft, north transept 17 ½ ft by 15 ½ ft, and tower 17ft by 17ft at the west end of the north transept. The tower, of four storeys, all vaulted has the usual corbel table and parapet. It tapers slightly from the ground level to the corbels. At the north-east Angle is a turret containing ninety four steps. Both transepts and the Lort Chapel are vaulted; the transepts have squints to the chancel. In the south transept is a piscina with a trefoiled head. The nave was rebuilt in 1851 upon its old foundations; it has no windows on the northern side; at the east end of the south wall is a corbel and a high window connecting with the rood loft. All the windows and arches to the chancel have been modernised. The font also is modern, nothing is known of its predecessor. The entrance is by a door in the south wall; doorway and porch are renewals.

Inscribed Stone RCAM

In the Lort Chapel is a plain stone slab bearing a much worn inscription, which reads :
CAMVLORIGI FILI FRANNUCI.

It is one of the early inscribed stones in which the county is rich and was used as the original stone altar stone. The stone is of the old red sandstone which although very hard is inclined to split off. From the formation of the letters it may be assumed that this inscription is no later than the 7th century. No cross exists on the stone nor are there any Ogham marks on the edges. It is suggested that when the Church was rebuilt in the 14th century the stone was found either in the foundations or covering the grave of the person commemorated, probably a layman and used for the altar.

Monuments

Two much weathered effigies of females lie side by side on the floor of the Lort Chapel; they would seem to belong to the first half of the 14th century, and are said to be the earliest female sepulchral figures in the county. RCAM

Effigy of a Knight

On the north side of the chancel is the richly decorated 14th century canopied tomb of Richard de Stackpole, last of that family. RCAM

Effigy of a Lady

This figure may represent Margaret, daughter of Sir Richard Turberville of Coity, and wife of Richard de Stackpole to whom she was married about the year 1349. RCAM

St James' And St Elidyr's Church, Stackpole Elidor; St Elidor's Church; St Michael's Church

Medieval Church, possibly C12, restored in 1851. Consists of nave, chancel, N and S transepts, vestry, Chapel, S porch, and tower. New exterior is of snecked sandstone, although traces of the earlier Old Red Sandstone still remain. Windows restored in Decorated style. Medieval pointed vaults to N and S transepts. Nave and chancel both have C19 timber roofs. Lord Cawdor's coat of arms displayed on floor of chancel. The Church houses a number of important monuments, including a C5/C6 inscribed pillar in the Chapel. RCAHMW

The Church is noted for its effigies of the Stackpole and Lort families including a well preserved 14c one of Robert de Stackpole and one of his wife. It is sited at Stackpole Elidor and has an Art nouveau lychgate with lead panels and cresting 1898 and a medieval preaching cross. The 13c cruciform design Church with its tall tower was completely rebuilt 1851. Chapel with several

Stackpole Elidor (Cheriton) St James & St Elidyr

There are transepts of c1300 with pointed tunnel-vaults and squints and the slightly later tower lies in an unusual position beyond the north transept. The south porch has a tunnel vault and the south Chapel a rib-vault. In the Chapel is a monument to Roger Lort, an effigy of Margaret, wife of Richard Stackpole and two other 14th century female effigies, Richards own cross-legged effigy with a dog at his feet lies under a fine canopied tomb recess in the chancel north wall.

This benefice comprised a rectory as well as a vicarage. George Owen states that the rectory was a sinecure, and that both it and the vicarage were in 1594 appendant to the manor of Stackpole [Elidor]. - Owens Pem.

The Church of Stackpole Elidor was founded by Elidox de Stackpole, who owned the manor of Stackpole, and lived in the early part of the 12th century. The manor remained in the possession of the Stackpole family until the death of Richard de Stackpole, the last of the male line of the Stackpoles of Stackpole, when the manor descended by the marriage of his heiress to Sir Richard Vernon of Harlaston, Stafford. It remained in the possession of the Vernon family till the death of George Vernon in 1567, when his coheiress Margaret, brought Stackpole as her dowry to Sir Thomas Stanley. - Old Pembroke Families p. 25-29.

The manor and advowson of Stackpole Elidor and also the manor and advowson of Stackpole Boshier [Bosherston], apparently continued in the possession of the Stanley family, as on 4 Dec., 1611, they were all purchased by Roger Lort and his son Harry, on 4 Dec., 1611, from Sir Edward Stanley, of Tonge Castle, Salop, Knt., and Sir Michael Hickes of Ruckholde, Essex, Knt. - Inq. P.M. of Roger Lort, 12 Jac. I.

The Lort family held the manor till the death of Sir Gilbert Lort without issue in 1698, when it descended to his sister Elizabeth, who married Sir Alexander Campbell of Calder, the ancestor of the present Earl Cawdor.

The vicarage appears to have been merged in the rectory after the death of James Summers, the vicar instituted in 1814. The rectories of Stackpole Elidor and St. Petrox were united on 22 May(?), 1839, under an Order in Council.

The nave of the Church was completely rebuilt in 1851 on the old foundations plus all the windows plus the arches to the chancel and the transepts, font replaced, and the entrance doorway on the south side plus the porch. During the rebuilding a silver penny of Richard II was discovered. (1377- 1399).

It would appear that the cottages that represented the medieval village of Stacpole were clustered around a cross. The cottagers were removed and the cottages allowed to fall into ruins, as they were mainly of culm their site has disappeared but the masonry base of the old cross 11 feet square survived Stackpole Elidor, alias Cheriton (S. Teilo ? S. James later),

A very beautiful Elizabethan Chalice with its Paten cover; no Hall marks. Both pieces are in excellent preservation. The bowl of the cup is gilded inside, slopes outwards towards the rim and carries round the upper half a single band of decorated strap-work which intersects four times. Within the band is the usual woodbine foliage, a spray of which is carried above and below each intersection. In addition to the usual two bands of vertical Reed ornamentation on the stem there is immediately beneath the bowl a rich band of egg and tongue moulding which is repeated round the base rim. The stem is evenly divided by a plain knop with a small fillet above and below. Height, 7in. ; diam. of bowl, 3 in. ; depth, 4 in. ; diam. of foot, 3 in. ; weight, 10 oz. 5 dwts. Underneath the foot is scratched " xiiii oz ". This included the Paten cover which is 4 in. in diameter ; 1 in. in height, and now weighs 3 oz. 5 dwts. On the foot or handle round which is engraved a band of zig-zag ornament is inscribed " STAKBOLE " with the date " 1575 " above, and ornamental scrolls and foliage beneath. Near the rim is a band of vertical Reed moulding.

— A Tankard-shaped Flagon with lid rising up in two stages to a small knob. It carries a whistle handle and thumb-piece but no spout. The diam. of the spreading base is 5 in. and of mouth 4 in. Between two bands of moulding on the dnmi is inscribed 'Ecclesiae parochialis de Stackpool Eiidor in Agro Pembroch 1715, J. Campbell'. Height, 10in. ; weight, 38 oz. 14 dwts. It bears the Hall Mark of the Britannia standard for 1715, the maker's Mark being Fr with a pellet beneath, in a plain shield for James Fraillon.

— A Credence Paten, 7 in. in diameter; 1in. in height, and weighing 11 oz. 5dwts. The date letter indicates the year 1685, the other marks being obliterated. Beneath is inscribed " Patena Sacra Ecclesiae parochialis de Stackpool Eiidor in Agro Pembroch 1715. J. Campbell". This same donor also presented plate to St. Petrox and Bosherston. He was the son of Dame Elizabeth Campbell, sister of Sir Gilbert Lort of Stackpole, the third and last baronet of that name. His father Sir Alexander Campbell of Calder or Cawdor in Nairnshire was of the house of Argyll and progenitor of the Campbells of Stackpole afterwards Earls Cawdor and Viscounts Emlyn. He represented the County of Pembroke in Parliament from 1737 to 1747 and was Lord of the Admiralty and afterwards of the Treasury. He is described by the learned author of Old Pembrokeshire Families as " perhaps the ablest representative of an able race ". " I can not," writes Stephen Lewis, a Canon of St Davids, to Browne Willis about 1719, " forbear mentioning to you ye generous beneficency of yt worthy and Orthodox Gentleman to ye three last mentioned parishes [Bosherston, Stackpool Eiidor, St. Petrox] on his first coming to ye Possession of his Estate, being about ye age of twenty or thereabouts — he wainscotted ye three Chancells and other-wise adorned them in a very handsome decent manner — made also new Rails about ye Altar — gave a new set of Communion plate to each parish and distributed a great number of Bibles and common prayer books to ye poorer sort.

I pray God ye example of so early a respect and veneration towards ye house of God may have its suitable influence upon other Gentlemen of Fortune and quality in their country. I had almost forgot mentioning his bestowing new cushions and pulpit cloths on each parish — and settling a house and ten pound per annum on a schoolmaster to teach ye poor children of ye several parish. Doubtless he'll have his reward.

N.B. [in margin] Ye Schoolmaster allowed meat and drink at ye house as often as he comes " — Browne Willis MS, 37, p. 60, Bib. Bodl.

The Earl of Cawders School

I visited this school on the 17th December. There was a deep snow at this time and the children were not present. The schoolroom which is built in the park at Stackpole is well furnished apparatus. It contains a gallery. The master appeared an active and intelligent man. He spoke highly of the natural capacity of natural of the children and considered it superior to what he had observed in the central school at Westminster. The best period of attendance in the year is from the harvest to December, and from February to May; during the above months most of the scholars would be present on an average four days in the week. Their age usually ranges from 5to 13 years. Expulsion is often treated by the parents with indifference: yet on the whole they are anxious to educate their children. They care most for their children learning arithmetic, and make this almost exclusively the standard by which to measure their children's progress. The greater part do not study at home but about 12 out of 100 on the books prepare a lesson in English grammer at home, to be repeated in school.

Sites of Interest

Coedmellyn; Coedmelyn, Stackpole

Coedmellyn is situated 1.5km north-west of Stackpole, just east of the B4319 towards Pembroke. It is a cement rendered building with a thin-slate pitched roof. It is a 2 storeyed house with a lateral pair of diagonally set chimneys and inside cross-passage, which may date from the 17th century or possibly the 16th century. It is rubble built with a plain central staircase. Alterations were made to the building in 1975.RCAHMW, 21st March 2005

Furzton Cottages, 1-2; Furston Cottages, Stackpole

1-2 Furzton Cottages, lying to the east of the B4319 between St Petrox and Pembroke, 1.5km north of the former, were a pair of north-south aligned cottages. They were 1 storey, 18th century, built of mortared rubble. They had massive end chimneys and recessed casements. Alterations, including substantial enlargement, was made to the buildings in 1974.RCAHMW, 21st March 2005

Bangeston, Stackpole

Bangeston is 1km south east of the B4319 at the end of a Long lane which starts 400m north-west of St Petrox Church. It is a two-unit house, with a rear kitchen wing at the east end, of 1.5 storeys, and possibly of the 17th century. It is built of rendered local rubble masonry, with slate roofs. The windows are all modern and there is a tall lateral chimney at the rear of the house, unrendered above eaves level. The front range of this house has a roof of seven bays which is perhaps of two periods. The kitchen wing has an attic floor and roof at a lower level than those of the front range. There is an early entrance with an equilateral-pointed arch at the centre of the south gable of the main range. To this core an extra unit has been added to the south-end in tandem, and a large west extension with twin gables and porch. The main feature of the house is an extremely large, square chimney to the kitchen, possibly the largest surviving example of its type, of which there were once a number of examples in Pembrokeshire. At its north side is a very large oven extension, with slate roof, presently occupied by a brick oven of ordinary size. Opposite this is a hearth recess for bacon-smoking, also slate-roofed. The chimney is corbelled in small courses and heavily sooted. The fireplace is in total 2.4m deep. RCAHMW, 21st March 2005

Lorts Cave Tumulus RCAM

This mound has practically vanished and is not noted on the 6in Ord Sheet. It stood immediately above Lort's Cave. It is entered in the county Survey as a small tumulus, within which was discovered an "urn between two stones. Burned animal bones" – visited 13th June 1922.

The dancing Stones of Stackpole: ,

3 stones 1 near Samson Farm, 1 at Stackpole Warren and 1 in a field near Home Farm. Said to meet on one day a year and go down to the Rhyd Sair [Saxon Ford] to dance. Some say the devil accompanies them on his flute.

1811 Fenton, Tours

There are three upright stones at a distance of about a mile from each other, pointed out here, respecting which the the country abounds with most ridiculous stories. One, the most eastwards Stands in Stackpole Warren; the other , surmounting, a carnedd or stone tumulus, in a field on Stackpole Demesne, known by the name of Horestone field, perhaps a corruption of Haroldstone; and the third in the same line but still more westerly. A vulgar tradition is, that these three stones on a certain day meet and come down to dance the Hay at a place near called Saiss, that is the Saxon Ford; and then their dance over, resume their stations.

The one in the sandy barrows, pitched on end like the others, I could distinguish at a distance but did not examine nearer but the other two underwent my inspection. The second in order is a great flat mass of limestone, placed erect, about six ft in height above the ground and about five in breadth, and a foot or fourteen inches thick; it is bedded in an elevated circular mound of stones almost sodded over, and merits investigation; as from its name and position so near this principal estuary, there is reason to suppose it may have reference to the ravaging invader, whose stone trophies Giraldus mentions, as existing on many parts of the coast in his time. There must be a considerable portion of the stone out of sight, and on that possibly the victor's vaunted inscription might be found. The third, the tallest of the three, is a stone of singular coloured serpentine, if one may judge from its grain in a small piece chipped off, the principal part being so incrustated with a minute lichen that it is difficult perfectly to ascertain its quality.

The Devils Quite RCAM

This is an erect stone standing within the prehistoric village of Stackpole Warren. Its height above the shifting sands is about 6ft; it tapers to a blunt point, and at present it leans slightly to the west. According to the Pem Arch Survey(p 107) this maenhir is "one of the three stones which are known as 'Devil's Quoits"; the others are in the next parish of St Petrox – visited 13th June 1922 Devil's Quoit, Stackpole Elidor

A standing stone, 1.7m high by 1.5m by 0.4m, reset in 1978 in the course of excavations about its site: the stone was shown to have been erected on the site of a circular structure that burnt down about 1395 BC and was part of a complex setting of small stones; a cremation was inserted into this complex about 940 BC: a later Iron Age and Romano-British settlement, or ritual, non-settlement site was also encountered & recorded. Greenala Camp

The following is the account of this camp by Lieut Colonel W Ll Morgan R.E., a retired Royal Commissioner, who carefully examined it some years ago.

'Situated on the end of a steep ridge which terminates in a promontary, across the neck of which the entrenchments are placed. The other sides are well protected by cliffs. The eastern flank is thrown upon a perpendicular fissure in the cliffs about 80ft in depth. The western flank on a steep cliff bearing evident traces of having altered considerably since the camp was made , as the remains of the rampart are still (1871) seen upon a landslip. The main rampart joining these flanks follows the curve of the Hill, and consequently slightly bowed outwards; but at the entrance , which is near the middle, a second interior rampart is thrown back almost at right Angles to the first, covering the entrance most effectively. The western flank, being the more easily attacked , has an additional very strong line. It would almost seem that, at first, it was intended that this should follow the curve of the remainder of the rampart, but after wards altered , and a salient thrown forward and increased considerably in height to defilade the interior from the adjoining ridge, following the works of the south of England. The space between this salient and the main rampart is occupied by a small work like a Tenaille, whose object is not very apparent; probably, it was only an obstacle trench. The western rampart has a steep scarp, at least 12 to 15ft high, and has been leveled at the top. The eastern defences consist of three scarps in addition to the main line, and all end on a precipitous cliff. Between the first and second is a low breastwork 3ft high and 60 ft Long evidently the remains of an obstacle bank. About 50yds from the entrance is a good spring of water in the hollow. There are many hut circles in the interior of the work”.

According to the Pem. Arch Survey “ on the sided of the cliff were the remains of a 'kitchen midden', and portions of a skeleton with a broken skull were recovered”--visited 13th June 1922.

Fishpond Barrow, Stackpole Warren

round barrow, 19m in diameter and 0.9m high, probably one of the two said to have been opened in the 19th century, producing Bronze Age material: there is a second barrow some 20m to the south-east

Remains of Village Cross

The few cottages which comprised the medieval village of Stackpole were clustered round a cross, of which the masonry base 11ft square , and three of its steps still survive; lying loose beside it are most of the stones of the pillar. The cottagers were removed elsewhere, and the cottages allowed to fall into decay visited 13 June 1922.

The Great ditch of Pencoyte

mentioned in the charter of Henry II to his town of Pembroke as one of the limits of the area within which the privileges of the Market of that place extended , is probably represented by the deep channel or gutter that constitutes the boundary between the present parish and that of St Pembroke St Michael. RCAM

Great Ditch Of Pencoyte, Stackpole Mentioned in charter of Henry II, natural stream.

The `Great Ditch' runs from just east of Maiden Wells where the B4319 crosses the stream, below Kingsfold) in the west to the sea at Freshwater East above Trewent Point, in the east. It is mentioned in the charter of Henry II to his town of Pembroke as one of the limits of the area privilege for its Market. It may now be represented by the deep channel or gutter, which is a natural stream, that constitutes the boundary between the communities of Pembroke and Stackpole. Pencoyte or Pencoed may be preserved in the name Woodsend and the Cottages of this name (now Furzton cottages), just south of the western termination of the boundary line. RCAHMW, 21st March 2005

Bronze Brooch (Roman)

Early in the 19th a bronze harp shaped brooch having the bow ornamented with small oblong panels which were filled with different coloured and ornamented enamels , was found on the site of the early settlement on Stackpole Warren. The brooch is now in the British Museum where it is ascribed to about 140ad. RCAM

1801 November 18 Stackpole court.

Lady C[aroline] Cawdor to C[harles] F. Grenville

I am happy to tell you that Lord Cawdor is considerably better tonight than he was when I wrote you yesterday. The feverish symptoms are much abated and he is in much less pain from his bruises. The history of the business is this.

He heard last Sunday evening that a smuggling vessel was coming into Freshwater East to land her cargo of spirits. He and Mat, Dio and Hand set out after dinner and rode down to the sand.

The people, as soon as they saw them coming ran off leaving all their casks on the shore. Mat Campell sent Kenneth to fetch some carts, thinking there was an end of the business, but in the meantime before he could return with them, the people on board the vessel, having discovered how few their numbers were and that they were perfectly unarmed, returned on shore again in two boats in considerable numbers, seized all the casks, and took them back to the vessel. Lord C. and Matt. did not of course attempt to oppose them when the numbers were so unequal, and were returning home when they were attacked by some of these horrible desperate villains. Two of them fell upon Lord C., one armed with a great bludgeon, the other with a large poker with which he hit Lord C. a violent blow on his arm. Lord C. jumped off his horse and tried to catch hold of him, when another came behind and knocked him down with a blow on his head. In this situation, with both these men thumping him, it is most fortunate he was so little stunned as to be able to get up and twist the poker out of the mans hand, with which he hit one of them, and then they both ran away.

In the meantime Mat. was attacked by two others, and you know how little able he is to make much resistance. Hand and Dio, however, came to his assistance. They beat off one of the men and the other they secured and carried him to Roger's house in Trewent. A short time after the house was surrounded by about thirty of the gang, people of the country armed with bludgeons, who immediately rescued their comrade.

Warrants are out for apprehending those men that are known but none are as yet taken. It was, to be sure, a most foolish business to think of going against smugglers without arms, and I trust they will act with more caution in future. I think it is most wonderful their escaping with their lives or at least without broken bones. Lord C. has been very ill in consequence; he kept his bed all day yesterday, and was twice blooded but, thank God, he is so much better tonight; I feel quite easy about him.

Write and let me know how you do.

Steynton.

The place name is probably derived from the Old English tun, meaning settlement or manor. Who Steyn was we do not know. One suggestion is a Norse raider.

Steynton was once a medieval parish and village, with a parish Church dedicated to Saint Peter or as it states in the monasticon, to Saint Kewel erected on its outskirts. This Church is an ancient and venerable structure, with a lofty tower, which, from its elevated situation, is seen from every part of the surrounding country side. The Church may have had links with Pill priory located roughly two miles south.

Steynton or Stainton 1839 Lewis, a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Rhôs, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Milford; containing 2903 inhabitants, of whom 1640 are in the town of Milford. This parish, which lies on the turnpike-road from Milford to Haverfordwest, extends to the shore of Milford Haven, on the south; and Hubberston Pill, an inlet from the Haven, is navigable for small craft, at high water, for a considerable distance. In the southern part of the parish is situated the Market and sea-port town of Milford described under its appropriate head. In the western part of it is St. Botolph's, the seat of A. I. Stokes, esq., by one of whose relatives it was purchased, in 1826, from the representatives of General le Hunt, who bought it, in 1803, from the family of the Elliams, to whom it had belonged for many years. The present mansion was built in 1800, about a hundred yards to the west of the ancient edifice, and partly on the site of a Monastery, supposed to have been a cell to the priory of Pill near the head of Hubberston Pill. In excavating the ground for the new building, several stone coffins containing bones were dug up; and part of the walls of the ancient Monastery, which are still remaining, have been incorporated with the out-buildings of the modern mansion. Bolton Hill, an old seat formerly belonging to a family named Bolton, is in the northern part of the parish, near an abrupt and lofty eminence called Bolton Beacon. While Cromwell lay at Haverfordwest, two of his soldiers entered this mansion, with the intention of plundering it, and Bolton, who had concealed himself, was denied by his wife to the soldiers. They nevertheless suspected that he was in the house, and one of them took up his Child, and pretended to throw it on the fire, on which the father rushed from his concealment, and killed the man on the spot. His comrade escaped; and Bolton, on reflection, deemed it prudent to inform Cromwell of all that had occurred, observing to that general that the man he had killed had only one eye: the latter replied, "The fellow was a great rascal, and you have saved me the trouble of having him executed." Castle Hall in the south-eastern part of the parish, was originally built by John Zephaniah Holwell, whose sufferings in the Black Hole at Calcutta are well known; it is a spacious mansion, and the grounds are extensive and pleasingly laid out.

The parish is about six miles in length from north to south, and a mile and a half or two miles in breadth from east to west, and is wholly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Culm is found within its limits, and a mine which had been worked for many years, for the supply of the neighbourhood, was some time ago re-opened on Lord Kensington's estate. Great facilities are afforded for the conveyance of the produce by the navigable creek called Hubberston Pill, and by the main Haven. Besides the town of Milford and the village of Steynton, the small village of Pill, distant about a quarter of a mile from Milford is within the parish.

The Living, a discharged vicarage united to the rectory of Johnston, is endowed with the whole of the great and small tithes of a portion of the parish; part of the remainder are impropriate in Mrs. Ann Wright, whose family, the Jordans, sold the other portion, which now forms part of the income of the living of St. Mary's, Haverfordwest. The vicar's tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £58. 10. The Church, dedicated to St. Peter, or, as is stated in the monasticon, to St. Kewel, and formerly dependent upon Pill Priory, is situated in the village of Steynton, and forms an ancient and venerable structure, with a lofty tower, which, from its elevated situation, is seen from every part of the surrounding country. The interior consists of a nave, chancel, and two aisles, separated by series of massive columns and pointed arches. This edifice was garrisoned with a small number of troops during the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I. There are two or three places of worship for dissenters in the rural part of the parish; and at Milford are a district Chapel in connexion with the Establishment, and several meeting-houses. In the village is a school endowed in 1832 by Martha, lady of George Devonald, esq., of Sodston House, with £30 per annum, to be paid out of her estate of Studda, in this parish, for the education of children in the principles of the Established Church: the trusteeship and management are vested in the incumbent and churchwardens. There are eight Sunday schools in the parish, two of them in connexion with the Church; and poor children of the parish are eligible for admission to Tasker's school in Haverfordwest, where the scholars are clothed as well as instructed.

At the head of Prix Pill stood Pill Castle, the capture of which is recorded by Fenton: there are no remains of this fortress, but in digging near the site, about a century ago, at a place termed Cwm, a human skull with an iron Ball in it was found; and a tradition is extant that a pond near the spot, now called Deadman's Lake, derived its name from having been deeply tinged with the blood of the slain on that occasion. Near the head of Hubberston Pill are the remains of Pill Priory, founded in the year 1200 by Adam de Rupe, for monks of the order of Tyrone, who afterwards became Benedictines. The priory was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Budock, and flourished till the Dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £67. 15.: the site and buildings were granted, in the 38th of Henry VIII., to Roger and Thomas Barlow. The ruins are very small, consisting chiefly of some fragments of the walls; the low entrance gateway leading into the garden is still remaining, but the arch above it fell down in 1826. At Butter Hill, which was a Grange belonging to the priory, live a family of the name of Roch, who are said to be descended from Adam de Rupe, founder of the priory. There are several ancient encampments, here called rhâths; one near the priory; another near the neat residence of Thornton House; and a third, called Old Castle, near the town of Milford: but not one of them is of sufficient importance to require particular notice. Near the ruins of an ancient Chapel dedicated to St. Catherine, a silver coin of Domitian was dug up, about half a century since. In 1818, a celt was found not far from St. Botolph's, where also are some remains of a Druidical altar, designated by the country-people the Long Stone. Sir William James, Bart., the celebrated naval commander in the East India Company's service, in commemoration of whose achievements the ornamental tower on Shooter's Hill, near London, was erected by his widow, was born at Bolton Hill mill, in the parish.

Parish Church St Peter & St Cewydd

Church St Peter & St Cewydd (or Cewell or Cuillus -- he was a son of Gildas acc./to Laws)

tall Tower visible from miles around

According to RCAM 1923

In 1851 Sir Stephen Glynne described this Church as “ of coarse and rude architecture, with the ordinary amount of mutilation and destruction of original windows” A restoration in 1882 made matters worse, the body of the building being “almost swept out of historical existence by a tornado of change. Excepting mutilated remnants of the main walls and the tower, itself in part falsified, there have survived out of the past only three small windows in the side walls of the chancel. Every other feature has been wiped out.

(Notes on the Architectural History of Steynton Church W D Caroe F.S.A. 1916 p3)

The main structure (including the first 20 feet of the tower or thereabouts and the font) may date from the early 13century. The plain font bowl (a square of 26 inches externally, and 20 inches internally, and a depth of 12 1/2 inches) stands upon a circular shaft 52 inches in circumference.

The restoration, however unfortunate, revealed interesting relics, which are thus described

1898 Cambrian Archaeological Association – Haverfordwest meeting 1897 visit to Steynton Church

Steynton Church and Inscribed stone – Here the party were conducted over the Church by the Rev E H Jones who described the remarkable discoveries made during the restorations in 1883, which included the foundations of an early Christian Church and two dolmens 5ft under the nave a Cromwellian pike and two horses skulls under the chancel arch and bones probably relics of saints built into specially prepared recesses in each of the piers of the nave arcades. Prof Rhys described the “Gendili” Ogram inscribed stone in the churchyard, and pointed out that it had been utilised three if not four , times as a gravestone at different periods, from the fifth of sixth century down to the present century.

The following letter relating to the discoveries in Steynton Church was addressed by the Vicar to Mr Edward Laws F S A who has kindly sent it to the Editor for publication :-

“Steynton Vicarage , Milford Haven

February 25th 1896

Dear Sir – I will endeavour to answer your questions as clearly as possible

The pike head was of iron and is now in the possession of Capt. Macfarlane RN Milford Haven

The cavities were found in the four pillars about 7ft from the floor

I cannot tell you the date of the arcade. I am told that there are only four churches with similar arcades. The pillars are square.

Dr Griffiths of Milford Haven, who was a member of the Restoration Committee, said at once that the bones found in the cavities were human thigh-bones.

We saw the foundations of a small Church within the walls of the present building ; it contained only a nave. The cromlechs were about 4ft below the surface and were more than 5ft in length.

I am Dear Sir, Faithfully yours
E Humphrey Jones

“E Laws esq. FSA

Mr Laws adds “ to Read this riddle is no easy task. I think we may take it for granted that the cromlechs (or Kistvaens) are the earliest of these remains.

The little Church is perhaps coeval with the Ogram stone standing in the churchyard. The arcade I believe to be a 13 century erection. Why the human bones were immured I cannot tell; perhaps, as Mr Jones suggests , they were the relics of saints.

The iron spear-head and the horse bones were perhaps of the Kistvarn date ; perhaps of the Ogram period.

Did the architect make a plan of the little Church?

A handsome 13c window was disclosed in the south wall ; also broken pieces of a font of the same period, which has been repaired.

Ogam Inscribed Stone

This stone, now in the Church, formerly stood in the middle of the burial ground , not far from the south-east end of the building. The Hiberno-Saxon minuscules , slightly injured by the subsequent cutting of a wheel cross, can be traced along the perpendicular line of the cross, both they and the Ogam Read GENDILI . In 1876 the stone was again used as a memorial and an inscription cut beneath the cross.

Arch Camb 1880 IV xi 292 ill xii 217

When building the new Vicarage the skeleton of a Cromwellian soldier minus his head was discovered in the grounds -- outside the cemetery boundaries to the north. The remains were re-buried in the Churchyard with a stone Marker with the inscription M. O. W. (Man of War)

The Church of St Kewit de Steynton was granted by Adam de Rupe [Roch] with the consent of his wife, Blandina, and his heir, to the monks of the order of Tiron in the Monastery of Pill, Pems. —Dug. monastic.

The State of Education in Wales 1847 Parish of Steynton (including Milford)

Besides the village of Steynton this parish includes the town of Milford where there is a district Church. The only school of public institution at the time of my visit was Devonalds's charity school in the village of Steynton. All the other day schools were private and situated in the town of Milford.

Of the Sunday schools the two connected with the Church are held, one in the parish Church at the village, and the other at the Vicar's residence. Each of these places is more than a mile from the town, in which there is no Church Sunday school at all. Of the Dissenting Sunday schools, Tier's Cross and the Priory are in the country; the three others are in the town of Milford.

There was likely to be an over-supply of day-schools after a great lack of them. The Vicar expected to be able to raise National schools and the Dissenting denominations had united to erect a British school. The latter had differed however in the choice of a site, the Independents against the rest. The Independents had fixed upon one just opposite to their own Chapel which was considered by the rest to be neither central as regarded facility of attendance, nor Fair as regarded denominational aggrandisement. Accordingly each party was going on with a separate school. The Independents had £250 or £260 in hand; and were going to erect a school upon plans No7 in the Minutes of Committee of Council, and engaged a master from the normal at Brecon.

The Dissenting Sunday schools at Milford are particularly efficient.

Devonald's Charity School

The schoolroom has many large and deep holes in the floor, which was made partly of bricks and partly paved. In heavy rains some of the holes are filled with water for want of proper drainage. The plastering is completely off in many parts. The roof lets water especially in the back part, and many of the windows are broken. There is a small gallery in one end of the schoolroom, where the scholars write on their knees when the school is full. The master and mistress live in the adjoining house for which he pays rent..

The school is supported by an endowment. The school furniture consists of one table (the master's property) and a few benches. The scholars are labourers children and are admitted into the school at 8 years of age, and educated until 12. they pay nothing for their tuition, except a trifle in Winter towards the firing. The girls are taught sewing two days a week. The master, an old man was ill in bed from the effects of rheumatism caught or at least aggravated, by the bad conditions of the schoolroom. His wife, in his absence, had sole charge of the school. She gave me the above particulars, and said "Many comes in and goes out; the children contributes a few pence to have coal; We puts them up there(in the gallery) to write".

The 6th Chapter of revelations was Read exceedingly well by several of those present and questions arising out of it answered.

The mistress said that poverty prevented many from sending their children to school, as they had nothing to send with them for dinner. I then inquired, and seven said their parents had no Bread that morning to give them to bring to school, consequently they were obliged to go home to have gruel, and, owing to the distance, many of them could not return in the afternoon

Mr Harries's School

A dirty room, with almost all the plastering off the walls, in the master's house was the schoolroom; the floor was out of repair.

The only school furniture I observed was two desks and nine benches.

The master did not speak English correctly.

The scholars, who were not present at my visit, are mechanics and labourers children and the master complained bitterly of the irregularity of the parents in paying for their tuition at the present high price of corn.

Mrs Morris's School

The premises and schoolroom were in excellent repair, and the mistress spoke English correctly

One large table and five benches was all the furniture in the room, except the mistress's chair.

The scholars were tradesmen and mechanics children. Many of them had been long under her instruction. The girls are taught needlework.

A small room in a dwelling house rented by Mr Morse is the schoolroom to contain 44 scholars on his books. It contains, with three tables, one master's desk and five benches, which made up all his school furniture. The scholars are the children of mechanics and labourers, and some of them were very well dressed. They conducted themselves well. They read the 9th chapter of 2 Corinthians. They were not in the habit of being questioned on what they read. The master had a good control over his scholars and said that his best boys were absent today. Several of the copybooks were well written

Mr Richardson's school

The schoolroom was incommensurable and in bad repair.

The Master is a superior man. His apparatus comprised a black board, maps of the World, of Europe, Asia, Africa and America, and of England and Wales; also (of his own construction) mnemonic tables of the population, government, and religion of different countries in Europe; and tablets for explaining punctuation, the parts of speech, and fractions (the later introduction to mental arithmetic).

His scholars are children of tradesmen and the more respectable mechanics.

They could all read and some of them gave very fair answers in scriptural history ,arithmetic (written and mental), geography, English grammar, and history with some little etymology.

Mrs Robert's School

Mrs Robert's schoolroom was one of the cleanest I have seen, and everything about the premises appeared in very good repair.

The furniture consisted only of four tables and five benches.

Mrs Roberts had received a superior education in her youth and had ever since been engaged in instruction. Her school was highly spoken of.

Sunday Schools

Church School

I visited this school on the 11th January. It is held in the Church and conducted principally by ladies from Milford (upwards of a mile distant) who walk out every Sunday, when the weather permits, with the wife of the Vicar. There is no time to hold the school for more than an hour. The master of Mrs Devonalds's school attends to preserve order, but does not teach. There is a clothing club attached to the school.

At the time of my visit the stove in the Church had only just been lit and had filled the building with smoke, but had failed to warm it. Excepting a list of contributors to the clothing fund there were no school books or registers of any kind, and the classes appeared to be so little organised that it was extremely difficult to obtain any accurate accounts of the school. There were not even class lists in the hands of each teacher, nor could they give with any certainty the total number of their respective classes. The instruction appeared to be far too desultory and irregular for much proficiency to result from it. Probably under the circumstances it could not be otherwise. The children seemed wholly unused to be questioned. This may have made them appear more ignorant than they really were. I heard nine girls read the fourth chapter of St Luke; eight read with ease. I heard four little boys read very wretchedly; four older ones tolerably well.

Baptist School

I visited this school on the 18th of January, in the morning, at which time there is always, and at this inclement season especially a much smaller attendance than in the afternoon.

I found 3 teachers and 7 scholars (6 boys and 1 girl) in the vestry room. The introductory prayer was in the course of being delivered when I arrived. It was earnest and good, cheering both scholars and teachers under the present small attendance – praying God to extend the influence of Sunday schools – especially that he would reclaim the many abandoned characters in the town.

Of the 7 scholars, 4 were reading the Testament. They read the last chapter of St John's Gospel, and on to the 1st of Acts without stop or comment. I was informed that questioning was confined to the afternoon school. To a few questions proposed by me on the passage read, and on general subjects of scriptural knowledge connected with it I obtained some remarkably good answers.

There is a Bible class of adults from which the teachers are mostly supplied.

There did not appear to be any school register except a roll book marking attendance.

Tabernacle School

I visited this school on the 17th of January. It is remarkable in this respect – that contrary to the general custom, the minister of the Chapel, the Rev John Lloyd, is the principal conductor of the school. On each Sunday evening for an hour and a half he holds a Bible class, at which the Sunday school teachers prepare the lesson to be read the following Sunday. On one evening of the week the minister holds a singing class at which some 60 attend; on another he gives gratuitous instruction in secular subjects to some of the junior teachers. There is a lending library attached to this school; the books are not exclusively of a religious character; they were nicely covered to preserve them.

The teachers meet to transact the business of the school on the first Sunday in every month.

I should say that the school was very well conducted..

Wesleyan school

I visited this school on the 17th of January. It is mainly conducted by the exertions of Mr George Williams, an officer in the customs and his sister.

The school was opened with a hymn and a prayer by the superintendent.

In this school, as also in the Baptist and Independent schools at Milford the vestry is used as a schoolroom for the boys. In all three the vestries are inconveniently small. I inquired at the Tabernacle why they did not use the gallery, and was informed that the arrangement of pews made it inconvenient for teachers who take down numbers, collect pence for missions etc. to visit the classes.

The teachers appear to be discharging their duties efficiently. They were really questioning the children and expounding to them. One in particular had an animated and intelligent manner..

Attached to the school is a lending library of 300 volumes entirely of a religious character.

The totals had been steadily increasing for some time. It seemed to me altogether an excellent school.

Denant Rath

This Hill camp is placed on a triangular neck of land about one quarter of an acre in extent on the eastern boundary of the parish 300 yards east of Denant House. The two sides are defended by steep natural slopes, which appear to have been scarped. The defence is a straight rampart 120ft in length, with an entrance at the north-eastern end. The rampart drops 20ft to a well preserved ditch having a fall of 6ft and a rise on the outer side of 10ft. The site is thickly timbered visited 27th July 1920.

Priory Rath

A triangular enclosure on the east bank of Hubberston Pill. Much of the defence has vanished. On the south and south-east the bank rises 12ft and falls 20ft to a ditch. The rampart has a total length of about 300ft. The site is still known as Rath Fields visited 23rd July 1920

Thornton Rath

To the east of the hamlet of Thornton is a strong earthwork, now densely overgrown. It may be best described as a semi circular area 100yds in diameter defended on the east by a steep bank and a stream which was formerly of greater volume than it is at present. At right angle to the stream is a ravine, the slope of which, below the enclosure, shows traces of scarping. There are two banks, the inner from 7 to 8 ft high, the outer almost twice as high. The exterior ditch is largely silted up. Outside the enclosure the ground rises rapidly. Quarry working has destroyed the entrance.

visited 23rd July 1920.

Castle Pill

During the Civil War of 1643 a small earthwork was thrown up at the junction of Prix Pill with Castle Pill about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the parish Church; it was taken later by the Parliament and dismantled. The remains still visible are those of an enclosure with a deep ditch to the east and traces of another enclosure beyond. There is a steep slope to the south and west and towards the north is an earthen bank. Fragments of masonry, including the foundations of a tower, are to be seen on the south side.

St Budoc's Chapelry

A modern house incorporating slight, if any, remains of an earlier structure; The place name St Botolph's, is of modern origin. The Chapel that one stood on this site was dedicated to St Budoc, which in the vernacular became St Buttock "This" said Mr Edward Laws F.S.A. (Little England p56) "was not considered euphonious so when the mansion was built it was re-christened St Botolph's!"

St Salmon's Well

This name appears as that of the southern part of a long rectangular field 300yds east of the residence called St Botolph's Monastery. It is not now remembered in the locality and no well could be discovered visited 27th July 1920

Site of Chapel

Local tradition asserts that the small enclosure immediately in front of the roadway leading to Denants House from the high road marks the site of a Chapel dedicated to St Margaret. This portion of the road is known as Church Hill; half a mile to the south west is Church Hill Bridge and a quarter of a mile south of the Bridge is Church Hill Farm. In Denant Bottom traces have been met with of an old road which is said to have come through a field known as Church Park about half a mile south-east of the supposed Chapel

In the course of the building of the modern house of St Botolph several stone coffins containing human remains were dug up (Lewis Top. Dic.)

Talbenny,

1811 Fenton Talbenny

After a pleasant ride by the Church of Talbenny through a rich well cultivated country , and passing Pearson, one the residence od a family of considerable repectability in this county, Mears, but , by purchase now the property of Lord Kensington.

1849 Topographical Dictionary of Wales Telbenny, or Talbenny

TELBENNY, or Talbenny, a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Rhôs, county of Pembroke, in South Wales, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Haverfordwest; containing 257 inhabitants. It is situated on the south side of St. St Bride's Bay, on a ridge overlooking which the village is chiefly built. Goldtop road, off the coast of the parish, forms the south-westernmost recess of the bay, and affords safe anchorage for vessels during gales from certain quarters. According to Mr. Morris' account, in his survey of the Welsh coast, it might be made a very safe roadstead, in three or four fathoms water, by the construction of a pier on Burrow Head, in the erection of which the beach might be cleared of the large stones that now encumber it. This improvement of the Haven, it is thought, would make it a place of some trade, as there are several mines of stone-coal

in the neighbourhood.

At the western extremity of the parish is the small inlet of Mill Haven, and at the eastern that of Little Haven. The living is a discharged rectory, valued in the King's Books at £9. 12. 6.; patron, Sir John Owen, Bart.: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £150; and there is a glebe of 25 acres, valued at £30 per annum. The Church, dedicated to St. Mary , is situated near the coast, below the village. A small school is supported by the rector.

1856 The Parish Church Dedicated to St Mary --Glynne Arch Camb 1886

A neglected Church in a high situation, not far from St St Bride's Bay. It has a nave and chancel of some length. The chancel arch is Pointed, and very rude. There is some indication of capitals in the north and south walls of the chancel, as if there had been an aisle or Chapel. On the north of the chancel is one trefoil headed lancet and one square headed slit. On the north of the chancel arch is a rood door. The north door is obtuse, the south door rudely pointed; the windows mostly modern, and closed by shutters. The font has a square bowl scalloped at the bottom of the form common in the county. At the west end is a bellcot with two open arches, but only one Bell. Carried on a kind of buttress down to the ground. The exterior walls and roof are whitewashed.

This Church is on plan a simple rectangular chamber consisting of chancel 26 ½ ft by 15 ½ ft and nave 42 ½ ft by 15 ½ ; it has a double Bell-cote above the west gable. On the north and south sides of the chancel are the original stone benches with return ends to the chancel arch. In the north west angle is a plain square headed doorway which lead to the rood loft. The entrance doorway is in the north wall; within are the remains of a stoup. A brass plate indicates that “underneath lies an ancient tompstone found in this spot during the restoration on the chancel in 1893 and also other ancient worked stones found buried in the north wall” The west wall is supported by a rude and massive masonry butress possibly comparatively recent. The font basin has been recut and spoiled. It was of the cushion type. The original circular shaft is used as the support to the vestry table. – visited 8th September 1920

The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Talbenny is a grade II listed building.

Church Bell

The single Bell which is of pre Reformation date bears the inscription :SANCTE MARTEINE ORA PRO NOBIS, and the dedication to St Martin has led to the suggestion that the Church itself was dedicated to St Martin, and not, as generally accepted to the Virgin. There can , however, be little doubt that the Bell at Talbenny is the identical one removed from the Friars Church of St Martin Haverfordwest, taken into possession of an official of the Court of Augmentations and accounted for by him.

CADW

Anglican parish Church, medieval origins, the W wall and bellcote probably late C15 or C16. The Church was much restored in 1868-9 for £77, with new windows and fittings, and another nave restoration is recorded in 1887. The chancel appears to be mostly rebuilt, 1893 by D.E. Thomas of Haverfordwest for £350.

1869

The interior has plastered walls, 1869 nave roof with arch-braced collar trusses. Plain pointed chancel arch with slight step in of jambs. Opening set high to left, part of former rood stair. At west end of nave, blocked window recess, which if genuine must pre date the bellcote. Pine pews, screened-off west vestry and lectern of 1869. Pulpit with single-panel sides and simple cusping, and matching stalls, mid to later C20. Chancel has iron and brass standards to sanctuary rails, encaustic tile floor.

1974

East window of Risen Christ, SS Mary and Mary Magdalene, 1978, 4 chancel lancets by Frank Roper of Penarth, in thick slab glass sparingly leaded and the clear glass varied with applied lumps of clear glass.

At the west end a much re-cut C13 or C14 square font with arrowhead scalloping below an incised line, round shaft and moulded round base.

The exterior of the parish Church, consists of rubble stone with slate roofs and red terracotta ridge tiles. Nave and chancel of equal roofline, divided by stone coping with cross finial. Similar coping and cross to E end. west end rough masonry, probably medieval, with battered wall-base and big projecting centre battered Bell-cote tower. Plain masonry with two arch-headed Bell-openings and a hipped stone ridge to flat top. Stone coping to nave gable each side. Nave has plain North wall: three ashlar trefoiled lancets with stone visors, arch-headed door with stone visors, between first and second windows. Buttress between nave and chancel. On nave east coping, north side, a stone chimney projects. Chancel masonry appears entirely C19. Two small North lancets, traceried East window of 3 lights with octofoil head, pointed arch and Hood mould. Side side has 2 similar lancets and nave South has 3 lancets similar to those on North.

de la Roche

The de la Roche family held land at Talbenny from 1219 but the after 1410 the estates were split between the two daughters and heiresses of Thomas Roche Old Pemrokeshire Families H Owen de la Roche Robert 1219 who was a witness to the Begerin charter, which shows that the three sons of Rodbert, son of Godebert, the Fleming, took the name of de la Roche . It is not too much to conjecture that he also had adopted the Norman custom, and he may have been the son of Richard, de la Roche David 1303 as appears from a charter of Geffrey Hascard in 1303 as to a right of distress at Johnston." In the same year, as Lord of Landegam and Maynclochanch(Langum and Maenclochog) , he granted to the abbot and convent of Whitland the right of pasturage for seven years on his lands at Precelly and other mountains and deserts in part payment for a horse" the abbot would seem to have got the best of this deal and in 1306 he granted to Alan, rector of Talbenny, a lease for his life of Talbenny Hall and a Garden at le Brodemore" (Broad Moor). Alan was to keep the Hall in the same state of repair as it then was, and apparently that state was not good. David was also a witness to charters in 1324 he held of the Earl a tenth of a fee at Osbarneston (Yerbeston), and, about the same time, of the Bishop two carucates of land at Hendref Cradoc in the patria of LLawhaden." He must have died soon afterwards.

Rodbert's brother, above mentioned but of this there is no evidence. This Robert was granted Talbenny by William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, who died in 1219.

de la Roche John d1376 who married Isabel de Bromwich, the heiress of Castle Bromwich in Warwickshire, and the widow of William de Peto. Dugdale, in his History of Warwickshire, gives a short pedigree of the de la Roche s.

Sir John died in 1376 his inquisition is extant" and we can learn the possessions of the Langum family. He held of the Earl the manor of Ladayn ? in free burgage, and land at Yerbeston by military service of the Lord of Kemes, the Castle and 200 acres of land at Maenclochog of the Lord of Walwyn's Castle, the manor of Dale and lands at Snelleston Snailston and Raymes Castle Ramas Castle, called by ignorant compilers of ordnance maps, Roman's Castle of the barony of Roch land at Freystrop, parcel of the lordship of Stackpole of the Lord of Haverford, the manors and advowsons of Langum and Talbenny, with other lands of the Lord of Carew land at Marteltwy, also parcel of Stackpole of Isabella, widow of Sir John Wogan of Picton , land at GuilFord, near Langum also lands at Herbrandston.

Mound RCAM

A circular mound locally known as "Twmpath" standing on Twmpath Park a field on the farm of South Hill. It Has a base circumference of 180 ft a height of 4ft, and is probably of sepulchral origin. It was under cultivation on the day of inspection, when it was noted that the crop on it was lighter than that on any other part of the field. It is not marked on the 6in sheet and owes the attention it now receives to the name given to it in the Tithe Schedule – visited 25th September 1920

Howney Stone Rath

This is a much weathered cliff Castle on Howney Stone point in the extreme north west of the parish. An area of about half an acre is enclosed by two lines of banks, of which the inner rampart is over 200ft in length. The entrance is about midway in the inner bank. The outer rampart is not carried across the promontory , but ends with a slight curve directly beyond the entrance. The site is known as the Rath in the Tithe Schedule. The ground rises somewhat steeply behind the banks – visited 15th September 1920

Broad Moor Rath

A cliff Castle about 500 yds south west of Howney Stone cliff Castle. It is also known as Mill Haven camp, the name of of the small bay which forms its defence to the west. The work consists of a deeply convex rampart and ditch. The bank has a length of 300ft, the entrance being midway. The rampart rises to a maximum height of about 8 ft, falling to an outer ditch. The entrance is 10ft across; the base is faced with massive boulder stones which appear to be part of the original work. The area enclosed is about 1 1/2 acres – visited 15th September 1920

Castle – Mining Operations? Howelston

This site has been much disturbed by Mining operations, and is now densely overgrown. It occupies the third field north east of Howelston farmstead, the field being still called "Castle". A modern road divides it from the steep cliffs of Mussel Wick. So far as examination is possible, the work appears to be a rough square, measuring 200ft on the west 216ft on the north, 272 ft on the east and 165 ft on the south. To the east and south the ground falls sharply, and on the south between the bank and the slope is a broad platform. The sea front would seem to have been further strengthened by a ditch, now incorporated in the narrow lane which runs between the bank and the sea. The entrance 15ft wide, is in the centre of the bank facing the sea. It is defended on either side by two parallel banks, which curve inwards; that on the north running into the enclosure to almost a third of its breadth, so that a passage is thus formed 15ft broad. The enclosure contains several circles several circles similar to hut circles, which however are said locally to be the remains of surface Mining. The site should be carefully cleared of its almost impenetrable brush wood. It was probably intended for the protection of sea rovers, and its general rectangular form suggests it one of the best preserved examples of a small Norse earthwork. --visited 23rd September 1920

Flemings; Flemings Corner

The names given in the Tithe Survey and still in use for three fields on Broad Moor farm. -- it is not possible to connect these names and localities with the unquestionably historical settlement of Flemings in the cantred of Rhos, but there can be little doubt that they point to a term of limit of that settlement.

Talbenny Airdrome CADW

Talbenny was built with three runways with a central intersection. Additional facilities included two T2 hangars and 36 frying-pan hard standings. Later in the war concrete aprons were added. The runways are intact. A few Maycrete and Nissen huts remain utilised for farm storage.

Event and Historical Information:

Talbenny opened on 1 May 1942 as 19 group Coastal Command station using Dale as a satellite landing ground. 4 Armament Practice Camp was part of 19 group and gave training in anti-submarine bombing, air-air gunnery and air-surface firing and was based at Talbenny from the time the airfield opened until the airfield was placed into care and maintenance in August 1945. The Vickers Wellingtons of 311 Squadron, a Czech bomber squadron, arrived in June 1942, with Dale being occupied by 304 Squadron (Polish). Both units undertook anti-submarine patrol in the Bay of Biscay. Fighter cover for the Wellingtons was later supplied by detachments of Bristol Beaufighters from 235 and 248 Squadrons. By March 1943, these units had departed to be replaced by 303 Ferry Training Unit who prepared crews to fly Vickers Wellingtons, Warwick Bombers and Lockheed Venturas overseas. On 11 October 1943, the airfield was transferred from coastal to transport command. 16 Flight of transport command were used for transportation of VIPs. The flight was based at Talbenny with an assortment of Handley Page Halifaxes, Douglas C-47 Dakotas, Vickers Warwicks, Airspeed OxFords and Avro Ansons until August 1945. 303 Ferry Training Unit (FTU) was joined by 3 Overseas Aircraft Preparation Unit (OAPU) in July 1944, to be brought under the umbrella of 11 Ferry Unit (FU) on September 1944. In August 1945, 11 FU was transferred to Dunkeswell and Talbenny was placed into care and maintenance to be finally closed on 23 December 1946.

Templeton,

Located 2 miles south of Narberth.

The town takes its name from the society of Knights Templar who established a foundation there towards the end of the 12c. The foundation ceased to function by 1312. The site of the House of the Knights Templar is believed to be where the modern St John's Church was built.

This is a perpetual curacy or district Chapelry, to which a district was assigned out of the parish of Narberth by an Order in Council, dated January 1863, The patronage is vested in the Crown. Since 1863 the living has been held in plurality with Ludchurch.

Nearby is Sentence Castle but it is not known who built it or when. There has been speculation that this was Castle near Arberth destroyed by Gruffudd ap Rhys in 1116 and again attacked by the Welsh in 1215 and 1220.

1283. Villa Templariorum mentioned. burgesses of the wind (de vento) [windmills] each paying the statutory annual rent of 12d and the total rents of assize amounted to £7 9s 4d.

It did not have a very large population as in 1532-3 and 1545-6 there were only 17 burgages.

South of Templeton, Carn Mountain Tumulus yielded one of the largest urns ever known to have been discovered in Wales . It was of late Bronze Age and is in the National Museum at Cardiff .

Battle of Mynydd Carn 1081 took place within a few yards of the tumulus.

Tenby

NOTE from RCAM 1923

As a parish under its single distinctive name Tenby has no existence. The administrative parishes are termed St Mary in Liberty and St Mary out Liberty, with the word Tenby occasionally added for the advantage of non-Pembrochians; but it is hardly necessary to state that these are quite recent parochial divisions, though they may correspond to some of the earlier townships. Tenby seems to have commenced its existence as a Viking settlement under the early Norse form of Tembych. This may of course, have been preceded by an earlier Celtic settlement, but there is no Archaeological evidence in the nature of camps or megalithic remains for such a view.

Introduction

Part of this is from research for a series of lectures I gave in Tenby – The information that Tenby St Mary's had once belonged to a Brothel did not go down well with one member of the audience but the rest especially the old Chapel ladies were very amused.

The name Tenby is an anglicised version of Dynbych (little Fort) and to distinguish it from Denbigh it was called Dynbyych y Pysgod, (Little fort of the Fishes).

Today it is the leading Pembrokeshire holiday resort whose population more than trebles in the summer months.

Roman -Tenby

The town is very old - from coins found very old indeed, older than the Romans. One very interesting coin is the one found at Tenby in 1881. This was a silver drachma of Menander King of the Punjab in 167-145 BC. According to the National Museum of Wales it could not possibly have been found but it was. Does this indicate that trade from the town, to the Mediterranean and beyond was going on before the birth of Christ? The history books tell us that the Romans never came to Pembrokeshire but after they were written a Roman road was been found.

At and near Tenby a bronze fibula and scattered coins have been found, including Vespasian (found with animal bones and coarse sherds), Domitian, Marcus Aurelius, Faustin Junior, Probus, two of Maximianus, Carausius, Dioletia, Constantinopolis, and Constans. Acc/to Laws pp44

Norman

There was a Welsh settlement here before the Normans arrived, but the Castle (of which little remains) was part of the fortified town. The town walls are massive, and the parts that remain are still in a good state of repair. In 1289 William de Valence Earl of Pembroke started work on the town walls and built the hospital of St John for the poor and sick. In the early Norman period it was captured by the Welsh several times. Under Lord Rhys and his brother Maredudd in 1153, Rhys's son Maelgwyn took it in 1187 and Llewelyn the last took it in 1260.

The first historical reference to the place occurs in connection with the destruction of the Castle and the slaughter of the garrison in 1150 by the Welsh, because the stronghold sheltered some Flemings who had attacked a Welsh Prince, while he was hunting near Saundersfoot. Between 30 and 40 years later, the Welsh by force won the town and burned it to ashes.

Acc/to Leyland-

Tenby stands on a main Rokke, but not very hy, and is so gulfed about by the Severn Se, that at the ful Se, almost the third part of the Toun is in closed with water –the toun is strongeli waullid and well gatted, everi gate having his Port cullis, ex solido ferro.

In his day there were probably nearly 20 towers and 5 gateways.

It supplied ships and men for the Hundred year war with France, and was very prominent in the wool trade, having two pandies where the woven material was processed. It also had two hospitals one for lepers, as well as St John's , for the sick and elderly. Opposite the town wall about 40yards short of the Five Arches, in the passage by the Old Oak Insurance Office, on its right side, there is a circular chimney. Possibly the oldest extant specimen of its kind as it is supposed to date from the 12c or the early part of the 13c. It is now part of a modern building erected on the site of an ancient structure which tradition says was the Lazar House or Hospital for Lepers.

By the early 1300's it was a thriving borough with 241 burgages, 3 windmills, and a watermill. Colonised by Flemish and English settlers, local tradition credits the Flemish with establishing two wool pandies in the town.

Tenby was the principle herring port of South Wales and had a large trade in oysters which they used to fish for by Castle Point and off Monkstone Point, until over fishing killed the industry. In 1528, 20,000 oysters were shipped from the port, sometimes pearls were found as well.

Tenby had other sources of income as in as well!

In 1383 a great ship of Genoa laden with Gold plate and other precious merchandise was relieved of her cargo by men of Tenby. The King appointed 2 commissioners to look into it.

In Tudor and Stuart times the town was an important fishing and trading centre and there were many rich merchants. The Whites were one very important family.

The Tudor Merchants House and Plantagenet House both date from the fifteenth century.

During the Civil war Tenby was held for the King until a three day siege and bombardment transferred it to the forces of the Parliament. A little later, mutineers held it for a few days against the Parliament. After that the local people used it as a quarry for building material.

It was possible to walk around the parapet of the walls until 1830. Then the public footpath around the town walls was closed, abandoning the walls to the discretion of those whose property abutted them.

After the Civil War Tenby went into decline. The decay of Tenby continued until, in the early years of the 1700's, almost the whole town was in ruins. Its condition then is shown in Norris's picture in the local museum. A little later, seaside places began to grow in favour, with those who were in a position to gratify a desire for change of air and scene, and as the merits of Tenby as a holiday resort began to be recognised, the town entered upon a new era of prosperity.

In the middle of the 1700's the town became a popular health resort and many new houses were built above the two town beaches to accommodate the Gentry. The main developer was Sir William Pakton, who built the sea water baths down by the harbour.

CAMB. JOUR., 1862

"The Castle standes upon the North East, but altogether ruined. The Hand of Cawdie (Caldy) lieth on the south west side, and so doth the little Hand called Margate (St. Margaret's). The bay is upon the north side of the town. St. Katherine's Hand standeth East. The whole town is built with lime and stone, verie stronglie, and is sett upon a sand rocke in most places above the sea, at least 20 yardes. One windmill standes on the south side. There is a fresh Brooke or little river that runneth west by south. The length of the town is north west, and south east.

" One windmill standes by the north side.

The Coale mines

lie on the north side, and the Coale is fetched into France, and into all the parts of South Wales lying upon the sea coast. The poorer sorts for the most part live by fishing. Tenby lieth very commodious for traffique with Spayne, France, and Ireland. There is before you come to the town by 3 miles a little valley between two hills called the Greene Streete, where the water runs into the ground 2 miles, and after comes above the ground again. To conclude : if the Hand of Cawdie be fortified, and the ile of Marrgates, and the ile of St. Catherine, the Hill on the north side, and the Greene field at the windmill on the south side, and the wall made on the west side, I think it be no way pregnable, so Long as men and victuals endure.

1769 Description of England and Wales, Tenby. Newbery and Carnan (coal)

On entering the south east part of this county from Carmarthenshire a road extends south west by south to Tenby or Tenbigh, which is seated on the seashore and has a good harbour for ships, at the distance of two hundred and eight miles from London. It was formerly fortified with strong walls and a Castle, but they are both now decayed. The ruins of the Castle are still remaining, and within its view are the isles of Caldy and Lundy, which are seated to the south west. This structure was well fitted out for the defence of the town and the bay. It was built by the Normans, and was taken by Rhys ap Gruffydh, prince of Sout Wales, in the year 1152, after which it was frequently contended for by the princes of Wales.

The town is governed by a mayor and bailiff, and except Pembroke, is the most agreeable of all the towns on the sea coast of South Wales. Besides it having a good road for shipping ,it has a commodious Quay, a large fishery of herrings, and carries on a considerable trade to Ireland, particularly in coals; for the inhabitants ship of yearly from hence seven of eight thousand chaldrons of coal and culm, and the coast of the bay abounds in iron stone. This town was anciently noted for a fishery on a bank called Will's Mark, in the Bristol channel but on the inhabitants growing rich, they forgot the old marks of their fishing bank, and thus lost the fishery; and though some attempts have been made to find it again, it has been without effect.

It has a Market of Wednesdys and Saturdays, and five fairs, held on Whit Tuesday, the 4th of May, the 20th of July, the 20th of October and the 4th of December, for horned cattle, horses and sheep. Tenby had a hospital or lazer house dedicated to St Mary Magdalen, and endowed at the suppression with £2 a year

Tenby (DYNBYCH-Y-PYSCOD), a parish, including the In-Liberty and the Out-Liberty, the former constituting the borough, and comprising the sea-port, Market-town, and fashionable wateringplace, of Tenby; in the hundred of Narberth, union and county of Pembroke, South Wales; 10 miles (E.) from Pembroke, 20 (S. E.) from Haverfordwest, and 245 (W.) from London; containing 2803 inhabitants, of whom 2512 are within the limits of the borough. This place was at a very remote period occupied by the ancient Britons as a fishingtown, for which its situation on the coast rendered it extremely favourable; and from this circumstance it obtained its Welsh name, of the first part of which its modern appellation of Tenby is an obvious modification. According to George Owen, an eminent antiquary of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, whose manuscript history of Pembrokeshire is now in the library of the British Museum, the origin of the present town is attributable to the settlement of the Flemings in this part of the principality by Henry I., who placed them under the protection and control of Gerald de Windsor, governor of Pembroke Castle, whom he ordered to provide them with habitations, on condition of their garrisoning the castles the King then had in Wales, erected by the Normans for the security of the territories which they had usurped by conquest. In order to protect themselves from the repeated attacks of the native Welsh, and to maintain possession of the lands that had been assigned to them, they soon found it necessary to build the towns of Tenby, Pembroke, and Haverfordwest, which they fortified with strong and lofty walls; and from that time Tenby began to assume a high degree of importance as a strongly fortified military post, and progressively to enjoy, from its advantageous situation, considerable prosperity as a maritime and commercial town.

In the year 1150, Cadell, eldest son of Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, being on a hunting excursion in the neighbourhood, was suddenly attacked by a party of the inhabitants of Tenby, who lay in ambush for the purpose, and who, rushing from their concealment, soon put to flight the unarmed retinue by which he was attended: but Cadell resolutely defended himself against the assailants, of whom he killed several; and, though severely wounded in the conflict, ultimately effected his escape. Two years afterwards Meredydd and Rhys, brothers of Cadell, in order to avenge this outrage, assembled all their forces, and advancing to Tenby, Scaled the walls of the town, surprised the Castle, and put most of the garrison to the sword. During the minority of Isabel, Countess of Pembroke, the several castles in her earldom were entirely neglected, and that of Tenby, being unprovided with a sufficient garrison, was attacked by Maelgwyn and Hywel, who coming against it with an overwhelming force, destroyed the fortress, burned the town, and slew many of the inhabitants. It was a considerable time before Tenby recovered from the devastation it suffered upon this occasion: the Castle was repaired, and its fortifications strengthened, by William Marshall, who, espousing Isabel, was created Earl of Pembroke; but the town remained for a much longer time in ruins. William had five sons, who all succeeded in turn to the palatinate: of these, Walter, the fourth son, gave orders for restoring the town and building a new Church and an almshouse; but dying in 1246 before his intentions were carried into effect, Warren de Mountchensy, who married one of his sisters, and eventually succeeded in her right to the earldom, completed the plans of his predecessor, and made to the Church a valuable present of plate and jewels.

During the wars of the houses of York and Lancaster, the fortifications were repaired and strengthened by Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, who, in the 36th of Henry VI. (1458), caused the platform along the summit of the walls to be widened, for the greater facility of posting soldiers on the battlements, and the moat by which they were surrounded to be much increased in depth and breadth. Henry, Earl of Richmond (afterwards Henry VII.), and his mother, sought shelter in the Castle of this place, to which they were brought by David ab Thomas, one of the brothers of Sir Rhys, a zealous adherent of the house of Lancaster, from Pembroke Castle, where they had been besieged. Here they received due attention from the mayor of the town, and embarked for Brittany under the protection of Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, uncle of Henry, who accompanied them to the continent. In the reign of Elizabeth, a memorial was presented by the Bishop of St Davids, and the principal persons of the county, praying that fit persons might be sent to inspect the Castle and fortifications of Tenby, &c., preparatory to putting them into a state of defence against the threatened invasion of the Invincible Armada of Spain. The walls were consequently restored by order of the queen, whose initials, with the date 1588, are still visible.

At the commencement of the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the Castle and the town were garrisoned for the King; and in 1644, Colonel Laugharne, with a strong body of parliamentary forces, laid siege to the place, which was resolutely defended by Colonel Gwyn, the governor, for three days, when, a breach being made in the walls, it was taken by storm, and the governor, the High Sheriff, and three hundred men were made prisoners. In 1647, the Castle and town were seized for the King by the same Colonel Laugharne, who, in conjunction with Colonel Poyer (governor of Tenby for the parliament) and Colonel Powell, had abandoned the parliamentary cause, and embraced the royal interests. From the strength of the garrison, composed of three hundred men, with twenty-five pieces of ordnance, and from the abundant store of provisions and ammunition with which it was supplied, it proved a formidable obstacle to the entire subjugation of the country to the authority of the parliament. Cromwell, who soon after came into South Wales with an army of eight thousand men, sent a detachment of twelve hundred, under the command of Colonel Read, to besiege this place; while he himself proceeded to obtain possession of Pembroke, then held by the three royalist commanders in person. For five days it held out against all the efforts of the united forces of Colonels Read and Constable, by the latter of whom the former had been joined, until the suburbs were at length taken by storm, and a breach made in the walls; the garrison was then compelled to surrender at discretion, and among the prisoners were numerous gentlemen of the surrounding country.

The town is romantically situated on the eastern and southern sides of a rocky peninsula, stretching out into the Bristol Channel, and rising a hundred feet above the level of high water. It consists of one principal street, and several smaller Streets diverging from it, which latter are in some instances inconveniently narrow. The houses are in general well built and of respectable appearance, and some of them command fine views over the sea. Considerable improvements have been made of late years, among which may be noticed the erection of a new Markethouse by the Corporation, in 1829, and the formation, at a cost of £900, of a line of road, by which the approach to the town is greatly facilitated, and a steep and dangerous descent from Narberth and the eastern parts of the adjacent country avoided, and which was opened to the public in 1831. In the session of 1837-8 an act was passed for the improvement of Tenby, and the regulation of its harbour. The main street is well paved, and lighted, and the town is amply supplied with water, brought to the different houses, at the expense of the Corporation, for which the occupiers pay from 10s. to 30s. a year, according to the value of their houses. The surrounding scenery is beautiful: the majestic masses of rock, of various forms and hues, that line the coast; the numerous bays and distant promontories stretching into the sea; the receding coasts of Carmarthenshire, with the projecting headland of Gower, inclosing the great bay of Carmarthen, on the western boundary of which the town is situated; and the small islands of Caldey and Lundy, with the shores of Somerset and Devon, combine to impart a high degree of interest, variety, and beauty to the sea-view, which is also pleasingly enlivened by the frequent passing and repassing of vessels navigating the Bristol Channel. On one side of the town is a drive of ten miles to the ancient town of Pembroke, through a fine champaign country, studded with churches, old castles, villages, and gentlemen's seats surrounded with plantations and pleasure-grounds. On the other side, the country is agreeably diversified with swelling eminences clothed with verdure, and small valleys richly wooded. The beautiful situation of the town, the fine beach and firm and smooth sands, extending two miles in length to the south, and one mile to the north, the transparency of the sea-water, and the pleasant walks and rides in the vicinity, have rendered Tenby a fashionable place of resort for bathing, and, since the close of the last century, raised it from the decline into which it had for many years previously fallen, to a high rank among the most favourite watering-places. Many good lodging-houses have been built for visitors, and a number of respectable private houses are also appropriated during the season to the reception of families.

Baths, provided with every convenience, were erected by the late Sir William Paxton under the Castle Hill, and are supplied from a capacious reservoir filled from the sea at every tide. The establishment comprises two spacious pleasure-baths, one for gentlemen and one for ladies, four small cold-baths, and also warm sea-water and vapour baths, with apparatus for heating them to any degree of temperature required: the same building contains lodgings for the accommodation of such invalids as may find it inconvenient to be at a distance from the baths, and a general room as a promenade, and for taking refreshments. The exterior of the edifice is neat, though without any pretension to architectural style; and an excellent carriage-road has been made to the house, which commands a fine view over the sea, on one side, and, on the other, of the shipping in the bay. A small theatre was erected about the year 1810; but dramatic performances not being much encouraged here, it has been converted into dwelling-houses. A literary and scientific society was established in September 1847, which has a well-supplied reading-room; and in the High-street, opposite the Church, is a good subscription library and reading-room. There are two billiard-rooms, and balls are held every fortnight during the season under the direction of a master of the ceremonies: races take place in the middle of August. The sands afford delightful promenades, and abound with shells of various descriptions, not less than one-half of the British collection of six hundred varieties having been found on this coast, on which many valuable shells commonly esteemed foreign have also been found.

Soon after the settlement of the Flemings at this place, the small harbour was greatly improved for the convenience of the shipping employed at the port. The trade, from that time, progressively increased; and a very considerable part of the population was engaged in carrying on the woollen manufacture, which was introduced by these settlers, and continued to flourish here for many years. From what cause the commercial and manufacturing importance of the town first began to decline, has not been clearly ascertained, but its manufactures have been neglected for a great length of time.

The trade at present chiefly consists in exporting to the western and southern coasts of England the coal, culm, and limestone raised in the Out-Liberty of the parish, and which are shipped from Saundersfoot, in the parish of St. Issel's, three miles to the north; and in the importation of shop-wares from Bristol, between which city and Tenby a regular communication is maintained by means of steampackets. Considerable benefit will be derived from the Tenby and South Wales railway, authorized by act of parliament in 1846, and which will have a short branch to Saundersfoot; the total length being seven miles and a half. The works of this line, however, have not yet been commenced, as their construction depends on the progress made in the great South Wales railway, which is not yet brought into this part of the country. According to the custom-house regulations, the harbour is a creek to the port of Milford. It is dry at low water, and is sheltered from the south and west winds by the lofty peninsula on which the town is situated: on the east it is protected by the Castle Hill; and on the north by a small but handsome pier of ancient erection, which, stretching north-westward from the Castle Hill, in an irregular curve, terminates in a kind of circular bastion, the whole forming a remarkably picturesque object. The mouth of the harbour is daily cleared by a body of water retained each tide by flood-gates. The adjacent bay of Carmarthen abounds with almost every species of fish; there are several fishing-smacks belonging to Tenby, and the bay is also frequented by vessels from the neighbouring and opposite coasts.

The Market-days are Wednesday and Saturday, and the fish-Market, which is plentifully supplied with excellent fish, is opened daily. Poultry, to the value of £100 a week, and large quantities of fish, are sent to Bristol by steamer. Fairs are held on May 4th, Whit-Tuesday, July 1st, October 2nd, and December 4th: that called St. Margaret's may, by charter, continue for three days; but since the establishment of the Fair at Narberth, in the reign of Charles II., in consequence of the more central situation of that place, the fairs of this town have been on the decline, and are now but very thinly attended. A new Market-place, as noticed above, was constructed in the High-street, at the expense of the Corporation, in 1829, on a site purchased for £450; it is commodiously arranged, and has a handsome façade, with the arms of the borough sculptured in relief, on a shield of white marble in the tympanum of the pediment above the entrance. A new fish-Market was opened at the end of Belle Vue, near the top of Quay Hill, in the year 1847.

The inhabitants were first incorporated by William de Valence, with the consent of his consort Johanna, by whose right he had succeeded to the palatinate. This nobleman's charter, which is still extant, ordains that the burgesses should choose annually from among themselves two portreeves, and that they should have free common over all his lands from mowing and reaping times until the feast of the Purification. It was acknowledged and enlarged by his son, Aymer de Valence, also Earl of Pembroke; and, in the 16th of Edward III., by Laurence de Hastings, Earl of Pembroke. The latter earl's charter was confirmed by Edward himself in the 49th year of his reign.

Humphrey, duke of Gloucester and Earl of Pembroke, extended the privileges of the burgesses, and made the mayor an Independent justice; and all the charters granted by the earls, as well as those bestowed by the reigning sovereigns, were ratified by their successors from the time of Edward III. to that of Elizabeth. Henry IV., by charter conferred in the year 1402, first placed the government in a mayor and two bailiffs, to be elected annually; and in the 23rd of Henry VI., the crown granted to the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses, that they should be free from all murage, pontage, &c., at the port of Bristol. Elizabeth, in the 23rd of her reign, confirmed all preceding charters, and incorporated the inhabitants under the designation of the "Mayor, Bailiffs, and burgesses of the borough of Tenby," granting them power to elect a second Justice of the Peace from among the aldermen, who, with the mayor, should hold courts of quarter-session, with authority to punish for all felonies, trespasses, and misdemeanors, not affecting life or limb.

Charles I., in his 6th year, added a third justice of the peace, and two serjeants-at-Mace, one to be nominated by the mayor, and the other by the bailiffs, whom he made keepers of the common gaol and house of correction, and also charged with the execution of all writs. Under these various charters the control was vested in a mayor (who was also coroner), two bailiffs, two justices, and an indefinite number of common-councilmen and burgesses, assisted by a townclerk, two serjeants-at-Mace, and other officers.

By the act 5th and 6th of William IV., c. 76, the Corporation is now styled the "Mayor, Aldermen, and burgesses of Tenby," and consists of a mayor, four aldermen, and twelve councillors, together forming the council of the borough, of which the municipal and parliamentary boundaries, including about 600 acres, are the same. The council elect the mayor annually on Nov. 9th, out of the aldermen or councillors; and the aldermen sexennially out of the councillors, or persons qualified as such, one-half going out of office every three years, but being re-eligible: the councillors are chosen annually on Nov. 1st, by and from among the enrolled burgesses, one-third retiring every year. Aldermen and councillors must each have a property qualification of £500, or be rated at £15 annual value. The burgesses consist of the occupiers of houses and shops who have been rated for three years to the relief of the poor. Two auditors and two assessors are elected annually on March 1st, by and from among the burgesses; and the council appoint a town-clerk, treasurer, and other officers, on Nov. 9th.

The income of the borough in the year 1810 was £287, in 1820 £572, and in 1830 £616; and according to the report of the Municipal Commissioners in the year 1834, it then amounted to £801, of which £622 were derived from lands and houses, £64 from tolls, £10 from water-rents, and £105 from harbour-dues. Some opinion may be formed of the importance of the property belonging to the Corporation, from the circumstance, that during the period of twenty-two years commencing in 1810, about £7300 were expended in general improvements; namely, £1700 for the erection of a Market; £1297 for supplying the town with water; £309 for paving and repairing the Streets; and about £4000 for improving the place, removing obstructions, and for labour. Of the sum paid for 3890 obtaining a due supply of water, £100 were for a reservoir, and £700 for pipes.

This borough, with Wiston, was, in the 27th of Henry VIII., made contributory to Pembroke, in the return of a Parliamentary member: by the act of 1832 to "Amend the Representation," Milford was added to the district of boroughs. The elective franchise, until the passing of that act, was vested in the burgesses at large, in number nearly 400, of whom about 130 were resident. It is now exercised by the old resident burgesses, and the £10 householders: the number of houses within the limits of the borough, of value sufficient to qualify their tenants, is 220.

Tenby is one of the places at which the poll is appointed to be taken at county elections.

The Corporation formerly held quarterly courts of session for the borough, on the Friday after the county-sessions were held, for the trial of all offenders, of whom the punishment did not affect life or limb; a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount above the sum of forty shillings, called the monthly court, which was held on the first Thursday in every month, and had power to issue process to hold to bail in actions for debt; and a court every fortnight, on Monday, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings. The jurisdiction of these courts extended over the entire In-Liberty of the parish, constituting the borough, in which neither the County Magistrates nor the sheriff had any authority. By the Municipal act of the reign of William IV., the borough was deprived of its exclusive jurisdiction, and other privileges, such as exemption from county rates, the ballot for the militia, &c.; the County Magistrates have now concurrent jurisdiction with the borough magistrates, and all cases of moment are referred to the general or quarter sessions at Haverfordwest, the county town. The town prison is used only as a place of temporary confinement, or prior to the committal of prisoners to the county gaol at Haverfordwest.

The living consists of a consolidated rectory and vicarage, in the gift of the Crown; the rectory rated in the King's Books at £26. 10. 10., and the vicarage, which is discharged, at £13. 6. 8. The tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £236; and there is a glebe of fifteen acres, valued for the poor-rate at £52 per annum, with a house, valued at £42 per annum. Tenby Church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a venerable and spacious structure, principally in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire, 152 feet in height: being situated in the centre of the town, it forms a prominent feature in the view of it from the sea and the surrounding country. The present edifice was erected in the year 1250, by Warren de Mountchensy, Earl of Pembroke, after the destruction of the town by the sons of Rhys ab Gruffydd. The body consists of a nave, north and south aisles, and a chancel; and the Church is richer in sepulchral monuments than any other in South Wales, excepting the two cathedrals. Of these, the most remarkable are the monuments of John and Thomas White, brothers, and eminent merchants of the place, which are sumptuously embellished and elaborately sculptured; each has the effigy of the deceased, in the costume of the time, and in each also are four compartments, containing effigies of other members of the family, of whom was Griffith White, mayor of the borough when Henry Earl of Richmond embarked here for the continent, and to whom, after his accession to the throne, that Monarch, in recompense for his services, granted a lease of all the crown lands in the vicinity of the town. An altar-tomb is still remaining, to which a brass representing a Bishop was formerly affixed, supposed to have been the memorial of Tully, Bishop of St Davids. The western entrance to the Church is beneath an arch surmounted with the inscription, in characters of the 13th or 14th century, "Benedictus Dominus in Domis Suis." The ceiling of the nave is of neatly carved wainscot, and that of the chancel is of wainscot much more richly ornamented; it is divided into square compartments with a knot of curiously carved work in the angle of each panel, the ribs resting on figures rudely carved holding escutcheons for arms. Some repairs were effected in the building in 1847, partly by a rate, partly by subscription, and partly by the aid of Mr. and Miss Tudor. According to Mr. Fenton, three chantry priests were appointed to officiate in the Church, one at the altar of Jesus, another at that of St. Anne, and a third at the "Rood of Grace;" for which services, lands producing at that time £13. 3. per annum, together with thirteen shillings and fourpence for lamps, were settled on the Church.

There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, Independents, and Baptists; and a building on the pier, said to have been dedicated to St. Julian, and used as an oratory, in Roman Catholic times, by seamen, prior to their setting out on a voyage, has been occasionally used by the dissenters as a marine Chapel.

National schools for boys and girls were built in 1831, on the Castle Hill; an infants' school is held, and there are several Sunday schools. A dispensary was established in 1843 for the benefit of the poor, supported by subscriptions, under the management of the medical practitioners of the town.

A hospital in the town, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, was founded at a very early period, but by whom is unknown: about the year 1236, it was endowed by Gilbert Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, with lands for the relief of the lepers therein; and its revenue at the Dissolution was valued at £3. 5. Queen Elizabeth, in the 23rd year of her reign, vested the lands in the Corporation, in trust for the benefit of the poor; and in the 43rd of the same reign, by an Act of Parliament for the better regulation and support of the poor, these estates were transferred from the former trustees to the overseers and churchwardens of the parish of St. Mary Tenby. The present income is only about £14 per annum; but on the expiration of the leases, which were granted many years since, the revenue will be much increased. Two marks, or £1. 6. 8., per annum, are paid to the poor in a monthly gift of Bread, by the proprietor of the estate of St. Botolph's, in the parish of Steynton; being a bequest made about the year 1633 by Richard Budd, in consideration of his having been saved from shipwreck by taking refuge within Tenby pier. William Risam, in 1633, bequeathed £50, and £200, to be lent without interest to, and to provide coal for, the poor; and to be employed in putting out apprentices: these sums are now lost, having been improvidently lent; as was likewise a bequest of £10, left by Thomas Barret, in 1623. Dr. John Jones left in trust to his brother, the Rev. William Jones, certain property, to be applied to such charitable uses as he might think proper; and, in 1703, the latter gentleman appropriated £413, to be vested in the purchase of land, now producing £63 per annum, for apprenticing children, and towards the maintenance of such persons as cannot support their families by their own labour; to which purpose is also applied the interest of a bequest of £40, by Anne Hitchings, in 1813. Of the charities until lately administered by the Corporation, the principal are a bequest of £250, by Abra Bowen, in 1679, another of £40, by Mrs. Anne Lloyd , and a third of £6, by Mrs. Hunt; with which certain lands were purchased, now yielding £27 per annum, the chief part of which is divided among three aged natives of the town, and the residue among the poor generally; together with the produce of £50, left by Mary Lewis, in 1783, in money and Bread. The charities till lately under the control of the churchwardens, exclusively of Budd's gift, noticed above, consist of donations in Bread, arising from some small bequests for the purpose. Among what were the overseers' charities, besides the hospital lands, are some fields in Knowle Park, purchased many years since with a bequest of £50, by Thomas Wyatt, in 1644, and now let at £15 per annum; and a rent of £2. 16. from Upper Cwm Park, bought with bequests of £10, by Elizabeth Pint, in 1656, and £45, by Anthony Williams, in 1696. Since the passing of the Municipal act, the public charities have been under the control of nine charity-trustees appointed by the Lord Chancellor. Some of the charities have been lost, and the principal of others laid out in the purchase of land; the whole of those still in existence are now comprised under three heads, Dr. Jones's, Almshouse, and Abra Bowen's, and their gross annual value is about £190. There is also property for the repair of the Church, consisting chiefly of land, and producing from £60 to £70 per annum: and besides the harbour-dues, there are certain funds for the maintenance of the Quay, pier, and harbour, consisting of nominal rents for houses, stores, and pieces of land, near the shore and other parts of the town.

Arch Camb 1851

The remains of the Castle are very considerable, though mostly in a dilapidated condition. The fortress once comprised within its defences the whole of the little rocky peninsula which, projecting eastward from the eastern extremity of the town, forms the southern limit of the small bay of Tenby; but the only portions now sufficiently entire to convey any idea of its original strength are, a bastion and a square tower, in tolerable preservation, some portions of the walls, and the principal gateway entrance. The state apartments may still be traced among the ruins, and they exhibit the appearance of a splendid baronial residence, rather than the features of a military fortress. On the north of the grand entrance are the ruins of a once stately Hall a hundred feet in length, and twenty feet wide; and near the gateway are the remains of another apartment, eighty feet long, and thirty wide; attached to which are smaller rooms, that seem to have been offices and barracks for the garrison. A portion of the keep also remains, occupying the most elevated part of the Castle Hill, and presenting an appearance of great antiquity. The ancient walls by which the town was surrounded are still in some places entire: the path along their summit, from the northern extremity of the fortifications to the south gate, may be traced; and the pointed arches by which the platform for manning the battlements was supported, are also discernible. There yet remain two of the towers by which they were defended, the battlements of the towers being supported by corbels; and likewise the south gate, surmounted by a low semicircular bastion of great strength: and besides these, some other towers of smaller dimensions, chiefly circular, and a square turret near the eastern extremity, are in tolerable preservation. Several of the towers are richly mantled with ivy, and the whole convey an imposing idea of the ancient importance of this fortress.

Numerous specimens of old domestic architecture, formerly existing, have been removed for the purpose of widening the Streets, and otherwise improving the town; but sufficient yet remain to give some notion of the style prevailing in Tenby during its occupation by the Flemings. Several beautiful engravings, also, of remains of early military and domestic architecture, now entirely destroyed, are preserved in the "Etchings of Tenby" by C. Norris, esq., published in 1812. Among the ecclesiastical establishments that existed at the place were, an hospital or free Chapel, founded by William de Valence, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which, at the Dissolution, had an endowment of £9. 3. 2. for an officiating priest; and a convent instituted by John de Swinemor, in 1399, for Carmelite friars, and in honour of St. Mary . Of this latter, some beautiful doorways may still be traced. Near the coast to the east of the town are several gentlemen's seats, some of them of very ancient date; among which are, Kilgetty, Hên Castle, Merrixtion, Bonville's Court, and Amroath Castle. To seaward are some insulated rocks of romantic character, in which curious natural caverns have been excavated by the action of the winds and tides; some of these are accessible on foot at low water, and one, off the Castle point, called St. Catherine's island, has been completely perforated by the force of the waves, and presents a very interesting appearance. About two miles and a half from the pier at Tenby, is the extra-parochial island of Caldey, which is described under its own head: it contains 87 inhabitants; and the extra-parochial island called St. Margaret's has 22 inhabitants.

Robert Loughor, LL.D., distinguished by his literary attainments, and by the offices which he filled in the university of Oxford, was born at this town, where he died in 1585.

Robert Record, M.D., also a native of Tenby, is mentioned by George Owen, as having been renowned for his works on cosmography, arithmetic, and geometry; he died in the reign of Queen Mary .

1844 Tenby South Wales directory

Tenby is a Market town, contributory borough and sea-port, in the parish of Saint Mary , county of Pembroke; 242 miles w. from London, 10s. from Narberth, and the like distance east from Pembroke; pleasantly situated on the west side of Carmarthen Bay, upon a point or neck of land running out into the sea---protected on the south, by the islands of Caldy and Saint Margaret, from the waves of the Atlantic and Saint Georges channel.

Tenby appears to have been a place of great strength, from the remains of its walls, towers, and Castle, the latter a venerable remnant of antiquity. The present town consists for the most part of one Long winding, well-paved street, of good breadth. The principal advantages enjoyed by Tenby over other sea bathing places, consist in the variety of its aspect and delightful views, the strength and clearness of the salt water the firmness and extent of its sands, purity of its air, and freedom from the smoke of works, and the noise and confusion of more frequented sea-ports. Almost every convenience and accommodation appropriate to a watering-place may be obtained in Tenby: there are reading and news-rooms, good libraries, baths of all kinds, comfortable lodging-houses, in pleasant situations, together with excellent inns suitable either to the economical tourist or fashionable visitor. Among the improvements effected within these few years, is lighting the town with gas.

The principal trade carried on here is in exporting oysters, in the shell and pickled in small jars, of which great quantities are shipped annually; the largest oysters in Great Britain or Ireland are obtained in Caldy-bed, between that island and Tenby.

Mines of stone-coal, culm, and Iron Ore found are worked within three and four miles hence; and iron - ore has also been found near the coalmines.

Tenby is governed by a mayor, four aldermen and twelve councillors, with the usual assistant officers. The borough is exempt from the jurisdiction of the sheriff of the county, having two sheriffs of its own, called bailiffs, who are elected annually by the burgesses. Sessions are held four times a year, before the magistrates of the borough; and courts for the recovery of debts, &c. to any amount above 40s. monthly, and every fortnight for sums under 40s.: the mayor for the time being is Lord of the manor, and judge of both these courts, and holds a court-leet and view of Frank pledge at Lady-day and Michaelmas. This borough shares, with Pembroke and other places (named in the description of the latter town), in the selective franchise.

The Church, which stands in the centre of the town is supposed to be the largest parish Church in Wales; it has a square tower, surmounted by a lofty spire of White freestone, serving as an excellent and conspicuous sea-Mark. The living is a rectory, in the gift of the Crown. There are places of worship for dissenters; a school conducted on the national plan, and one for infants. The Corporation have two charities under their control, both for the decayed housekeepers; to one of these is attached a fund for apprenticing poor children.

The land around the town is mountainous, and not remarkably productive; but the views are very pleasing, and the north east aspect of the town has an extensive prospect over the whole of Carmarthen bay, seen beyond its own beautiful cliffs and promontories.

The Markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday; and the fairs, on the 4th of May, at Whitsuntide, the 31st of July, and two days after; the 2nd of October, and the 4th of December.

The town of Tenby, and parish of St. Mary (within and without the town) contained, by the returns for 1831, 2,128 inhabitants; and by the census for 1841, 2,912.

1850's VICTORIAN NATURALISTS IN Tenby (Extract)

Margaret Davies, C.B.E., M.A., Ph.D.

The mid-19th century saw a remarkable surge of interest in plants and animals. and, particularly. in the fascinating and colourful life of the seashores of expanding holiday resorts. Victorian energy and inventiveness. which expanded the railway network and produced the salt-water aquarium. led to the heyday of natural history'. Tenby, on its rocky peninsula flanked by superb beaches and outlying islands. played its part in this heyday. attracting biologists of the calibre of T. H. Huxley and P. H. Gosse. Both were befriended by a resident marine zoologist. Dr. F. D. Oyster.

In 1850 Tenby town still lay largely within its medieval walls. Cottages and fine town houses lined the Norton, originally a medieval 'suburb'. The Croft had its dignified terrace of lodging houses. and a few villas set in 'pleasure grounds' had been built on Greenhill and in Heywood Lane. overlooking the Green Developments by Sir William Paxton. the Town Council and leading townsfolk had made the resort attractive to well-to-do visitors from London. the Bristol -Cheltenham area and South Wales. Tenby was also becoming well - known as a healthy retreat for invalids and for the retired, especially military and naval officers. By 1854 the main London Haverford west railway brought passengers to Narberth road (Ciynderwen) station. from which they travelled to Tenby in coaches supplied by the Cobourg or Lion hotels.

By 1804 the virtues of sea water were well advertised and the naturalist at rock pools was liable to find "the female peasantry enjoying. without disguise. the delicious coolness and delight of bathing in the open sea". Donovan also observed starfish, sea urchins and crabs feeding on the overfished oysters of the beds between Caldey and Penally. Tenby's fishermen, with their small open boats, had dredged and pickled oysters for fifty years. Now they were being displaced in fishing and dredging by Torbay men who had larger boats; they sent their catches twice weekly to Bristol and came into Tenby for weekends. Because the Tenby men had refused to pay their fish tithes and to worship at St Julian 's Chapel on the old curved pier, the Chapel had been transformed by Esau Jones "an intelligent apothecary of Haverfordwest" into Tenby's first bathing house.

In 1847 two physicians, who lived in the handsome St Julian Street houses which overlook the south beach and Caldey, were fostering interest in natural history among both residents and visitors. Dr Randle Wilbraham Falconer founded Tenby Literary and Scientific Society in 1847: its well-stocked reading room and meeting room were at the Paragon end of Cresswell Street.

Tenby Museum was not established until 1878.

Frederick Daniel Oyster (1810-1893), M.D., F.L.S., came to 2, Rock Houses, St Julian Street in 1847 from Madeira, where he had settled for health reasons and had acted as unpaid medical officer. He gave £200 to clear Tenby Hospital's debt when it was opened in 1871 and built a women's ward there in memory of his wife Fanny Guillemard, a descendant of Huguenot refugees". Oyster served on the Town Council from 1866 to 1872 and was mayor of Tenby in 1867-8. He promoted Tenby Savings Bank, gave St Mary's an Organ and erected the drinking fountain in Tudor Square as a memorial to Lt. Col. Thomas Wedgwood of St Mary's Hill, Tenby, a Waterloo veteran and grandson of Josiah Wedgwood. Dr Oyster was a founder trustee of Tenby Museum.

1860-1863 Tenby area From The Cambrian Journal

Tenby, with its environs, is one of those interesting localities that has something to show or tell to each of its many friends. In my case it suggested the hints here thrown together. Meagre though they be, they suffice to show the extensive and engaging nature of the remains abounding in the neighbourhood.

It struck me, however, with surprise, that whilst the natural productions of the district have been ably described, so little has been done to follow out its historical antecedents and mediaeval relics. There are, it is true, several attractive volumes relating some of the more salient events of bygone times, but they are treated in a general way only, and leave the antiquary dissatisfied, and anxious for more specific information. That this is to be had for seeking, no one can doubt who is at all acquainted with the facilities that the present day presents for investigating the lore of the middle ages.

Several highly competent gentlemen reside near, whose local knowledge, combined with their antiquarian acumen, points them out as well able to investigate this subject : may they they be induced to undertake a thorough prosecution of it.

It will at once be observed that Tenby Church varies in the style and age of its different parts.

Severely simple in character, and constituting the nucleus of the whole, the Tower must be pronounced the oldest portion of the Church, yet one that has undergone least alteration, either in itself, or in relative position, still spanning the middle of the south aisle. Only when its spire was added, to a height equal to the length of the fabric, probably in the fifteenth century, something was done to strengthen the piers, though they were afterwards cut away, the better to open views of the altar from the west, which may have been then raised to its present elevation.

Whilst the tower somewhat resembles those of other neighbouring churches, its battlements and loop-hole windows are more military looking than ecclesiastical, and its masonry and archings so nearly correspond with the town walls and towers, as to indicate a common origin. These have been attributed to William de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, who died in 1296.

Examining in the next place the body of the Church, its many incongruities, though pleasingly united as a whole, constitute a perplexing problem for the antiquary's solution. Thus the south side of the nave seems older than the north. Both of the east arches are larger than the rest, and none of the piers are opposite one another. An altar appears to have stood against a screen beneath the chancel arch, its north aisle being curiously contracted at the east end by the adjoining street. This part looks later than the rest, its roof necessitating the blocking up of the clerestory windows of the chancel.

The rich double altar-tomb of the Whites is, certainly as old as 1453, and the body of the building, judging by the general agreement in the tracery of its windows, is of nearly the same age. Hence most of the structure belongs to the first half of the fifteenth century. Indeed, John and Thomas White, the wealthy merchants of the town, and strong churchmen, as the correct character of their monument bespeaks, may have been the generous edifiers of this spacious temple. The elegant west door is so like Canynge's work at St. Mary's, Redcliffe, as to suggest familiar intercourse between them.

Tully, Bishop of St Davids from 1460 to 1482, may have also helped in carrying out the design, in common with the Rector, Doctor John Smith, who seems to have re-roofed a considerable part of the building.

And now let me ask your aid in placing before your readers some particulars respecting that remarkable feature of the domestic buildings erected by the former inhabitants of this locality, viz., the Flemish chimney shaft. Though for a century or two their removal has been going on, and less cumbrous appendages raised in their stead, yet they are sufficiently numerous to constitute a group of themselves. Even in Tenby several remain, whilst one or more may be found in the old houses sprinkled about in the hamlets and villages round.

They consist of a slightly tapering cylindrical shaft, the top being made conical, built up with fragments of stone, and a liberal amount of mortar, on a square base.

Whilst such is their invariable type, the buildings to which they are severally united belong to different eras. Sometimes they form part of an Edwardian ruin, as at Manorbeer, &c., or else of an Elizabethan one, as at Scotsborough, &c. Yet their appearance is one and the same. In size they are nearly equal, the only appreciable difference being that the older are of better workmanship.

None, however, of the structures with which they are incorporated exhibit marks of much earlier date than the fourteenth century. Hence, if a higher antiquity is sought for these chimneys, it must be obtained in some other way. A Flemish origin has been ingeniously claimed for them, and therefore one that reaches away to the twelfth century. Such presumption cannot however be supported. Nothing like them exists in Belgium, and they occur beyond the limits of the territory colonized by that people. A more natural solution of their source is to be found in the building stone of the neighbourhood, combined with the admirable lime it affords. This latter is so binding and durable, as to fit it for firmly uniting odd shaped bits of rock, and retaining them together for ages. Hence the surprising durability of these chimneys. The stone of the district breaks so short, and is so hard, that a hollow square shaft can scarcely be made with it, consequently brick or cement are now used instead, as the angular flue is universally preferred.

Indeed, wherever building-stone similar to that of this district is met with, the oldest masonry is found constructed on the circular plan, be they towers, spires, pinnacles, or turrets.

In addition to the old, so-called, Flemish Chimneys that Mark this neighbourhood, I find another topic worthy the attention of your readers, in the number of stone vaultings covering the churches, Halls, &c., erected in South Pembrokeshire, circa A.D. 1300, if not before.

That in the tower of the Church here, indicative of similar arching over the whole building, as originally constructed, is a familiar instance. Manorbeer Castle appears to have been almost covered in by this mode, and it seems to have been largely prevalent at Carew Pembroke, &c.

Similar examples occur in the Churches of Penally, Gumfreston, St. Florence, &c., so much so that a stranger, on raising his eyes when entering them, is struck by their cavernous look, which he immediately sees to be genuine stone vaulting, by the thickness given to the sustaining walls.

It is remarkable that a kind of medium span, not exceeding twenty feet, as well as pitch, usually comprising an angle of 60 degrees, is observed in each case. Neither ribs, bosses, or brackets, are found in any of them, so that they manifest the simplest construction.

Frequently the vaulting, by being made roof-shaped on its upper surface, serves both as a covering as well as a ceiling a double purpose that the admirable lime of the country has enabled it unimpaired to fulfil for ages and ages.

One interesting conclusion that seems deducible from such mode of covering in buildings, and the consequent total absence of wood in their construction, is that it resulted from the difficulty of obtaining timber, except at great cost. I infer, therefore, that there was a want of suitable trees, this part of the shire being kept bare of them by the Atlantic storms to which the district lies exposed. It is certainly remarkable that no large timber trees are to be found here, though it is pleasing to see how well some of those that have been planted in sheltered situations are getting up. Hence we observe how, by means of vaulting their buildings, the old architects of this locality yielded to circumstances, and made circumstances yield to them.

Although the ancient mortar of this locality is extremely good, yet nearly all old mortar is better than much that is made now. I have sometimes thought this superiority may be accounted for by supposing that as, before coal became known, lime kilns were supplied with wood fuel, this had a beneficial effect upon the stone. Whilst admitting, however, that in early times most of the lime used in Great Britain must have been prepared with charcoal, the true cause of its greater excellence seems to have resulted from the admirable way in which mortar was made, not, as is often the case now, chiefly of very fine sand, but always predominating in lime, the sand being coarse, with a considerable quantity of the local rock broken small added afterwards. A good example of such admixture is to be seen in the mortar of Pembroke Castle. On examination it will be found to abound in chips of old red sandstone, such as would be made in dressing the masonry of the building. By such means the consumption of lime would be economised, and the quality of the mortar uninjured.

But several of the old structures near here are formed of unworked stones, in which instances it is curious to observe how their builders continued to make the most of the lime, without reducing its excellence. The problem is solved in the rude old towers dotted over the country between here and Pembroke. In the mortar of these buildings no red sandstone chips occur, but in their stead we perceive bits of coal ; thus supplying the interesting information that the coal works of this neighbourhood were then in operation, being probably resorted to, for domestic uses, five hundred and fifty years ago.

The second point I desire briefly to dwell upon is the nearly total absence of buttresses from the buildings of this locality, for neither in its sacred, castellated, or domestic edifices, do they appear. The age of their erection abounds with them elsewhere; yet we find that in these parts the mediaeval architects did without them, by giving increased thickness to their walling, and by sloping their work inwards as it rose

I feel sure that they were induced to carry up their stone work thus, because of the difficulty of adapting the limestone of the district to angular requirements, and therefore the craftsmen preferred to have as little of that sort of work in their buildings as possible. Here, then, is an instance similar to the so-called Flemish chimneys, exhibiting, in common with them, the adaptation of structure to materials.

For further observations on these Archaeological particulars, I feel I cannot do better than refer to the remarks of the author of the Glossary of Architecture, as given in the Gentleman s Magazine.

I would now invite attention to the architectural details of the west Doorway of Tenby Church, as well as to the one opposite it, opening upon the site of the old Chantry.

Both of them appear to me to be moorish, difficult as it may seem to account for such singularity of origin. I think, however, that this can be done by admitting the similarity between these doorways and the porch of St. Mary's, Redcliffe, which is, if possible, more moorish still. Now, it is highly probable that these owe their erection to those contemporary and eminent merchants of the middle ages, viz., the Whites of Tenby, and the Canynges of Bristol. They were, doubtless, well known to each other, and would be apt to include the coast of Spain in their trading circle, if they did not actually visit it themselves. "Tenby," says the writer of the Winnington MS., dated 1621, "lieth very commodious for traffique with Spayne." The Arab name of Jasper, or Gaspar, borne by one of the Whites, seems to point to the above intercourse. Adomar[?] de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, who died, seized of such vast estates, in 1324, appears to have derived his name from a like source, i.e., Spanish Valencia, in common with an island on the Kerry coast of Ireland, not very distant from the town of Galway, which also contains several old moorish buildings.

Passing on to another subject, let me notice the considerable depth below the level of the adjoining soil, that is occasionally found in the lanes about Tenby, &c. Upwards of ten feet may be detected in places, justifying the quaint old name of "Hollow Ways" Surely, such depression proves great antiquity, being the water-action, and wear of many ages and generations of men. There appears no other way of accounting for such formation. We may be certain they were not made so deep originally. No soil appears thrown up on their banks, and certainly no modern road-maker has taken them in hand. The lanes themselves are proved to be old, by the manner in which they determined the shape of the adjacent fields, or the position of some antiquated houses standing near.

Our high roads are often very ancient, and, no doubt, the old Tenby lanes are as aged as the oldest of them.

‘At Tenby itself, the huge Church has nothing local but the tower; but the process by which it has swelled to its present form is worth comparing with Grantham and Great Yarmouth. The most really interesting thing at Tenby is the town wall, which remains very nearly perfect. Throughout the whole of one side Of the Castle only fragments are left;but the peninsular Hill stands nobly , looking over the sea two ways, to the island known as Caldy on the one side and on the other side to Worm’s Head.

1895 Tenby Timmin Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire

One clear, calm evening in May of this drought year of Grace 1893,we emerge dusty and sun-baked from the tropical recesses of the ' tunnel express,' alight at Tenby Station, and wend our way through the Streets of that clean little town to seaside quarters overlooking a picturesque bay, where some fishing-craft lie quietly at anchor off the harbour mouth. Towards sundown a miniature fleet of trawlers sweeps gracefully landwards around the Castle Hill, looking for all the world like a flight of brilliant butterflies; their russet sails glowing in the warm light of the sun's declining rays with every hue from gold to ruddy purple, recalling memories of gorgeous scenes on far-away Venetian lagoons.

Hailing from many a Haven between Milford and strong savoured Brixham, these handy little vessels ply their calling around our south-western shores; pushing their ventures, when opportunity serves, to the North Sea fishing-grounds, and even to the remoter shores of Scotland. The visitor curious in such matters soon learns to distinguish between the well-found Brixham trawler and the handy sloop from Milford certain cabalistic letters painted upon the parti-coloured sails denoting the port where, according to custom, each boat is respectively registered.

Tenby town is in many respects happy in what a local historian quaintly terms its ' approximation.' Turning its back upon the quarter whence blow the strongest gales, and sheltered by the high ground of the Ridgeway, that part of the town most frequented by visitors faces south by east across the land-locked waters of Carmarthen Bay. Hence a pleasant view is obtained of the opposite coast of Gower and the more distant highlands of North Devon ; while Caldey Island lies like a breakwater against the waves of the open Channel. As shrewd old Leland observes :

' Tinbigh Town standith on a main Rokke, but not very hy ; and the Severn Se so gultith in about hit that, at the ful Se, almost the third part of the Toun is inclosid with water.'

Tenby can boast a fair sprinkling of good hotels and lodging houses. The town is made further attractive as a place of residence by a well-appointed club, a circulating library, excellent public baths and a small museum of local interest. Last, but by no means least amongst its attractions.

Nature has provided a broad expanse of firm, dry sands, much appreciated by children and bathers at holiday times.

With a fair train-service upon the railway, good carriages and boats for hire, and steamboats calling at intervals, Tenby affords a convenient centre whence to explore the remoter recesses of South Pembrokeshire, for few and far between are the resting-places for the wayfarer in that rather inaccessible region.

Djnbych-y-Pysgod — the Little Town of Fish — appears to have been a place of some importance from very early- times. By the middle of the twelfth century we find the town in the hands of the Flemish soldiery ; and subsequently disasters came thick and threefold upon the devoted inhabitants. During the reign of Henry II., Maelgwyn ap Rhys, a person who is euphemistically described as ' of civil behaviour and honesty in all his actions,' ascertaining that many of the townsfolk were absent at the foreign wars, made a sudden onslaught, set fire to the ill-fated town, and burnt it to the ground. Less than a century later the place was again taken and destroyed by- Llewelyn ap Gruffydd ; and after a further respite of about 200 years, the notorious Owain Glyndwr appeared before the walls, laid siege to, and made himself master of the little western seaport.

Notwithstanding these misfortunes, ' the King's town of Tenby ' henceforth grew and prospered unmolested. In 1402 Tenby was made a corporate town ; and by the middle of the fifteenth century it had already become a centre of considerable trade and enterprise, encompassed by strong stone walls and towers built by Earl William de Valentia, Lord of Pembroke. The town walls are said to have been rebuilt by one Thomas White, the scion of a famous burgher family who was Mayor of this ancient borough in 1457.

When Leland passed this way in the reign of bluff King Hal, he found the ' Toun strongeli waullid and well gatid, everi Gate having hys Port collis ex, solide fcvro.' ' But,' says Fenton, writing in the early part of the present century, ' it was left for Queen Elizabeth, who was a great benefactress of the town in general, and whose initials are still extant over parts of the town walls, to contribute that strength and perfection to them which the present remains are a striking proof of.'

Earl William (who appears to have been a generous patron of the town) granted the first charter of liberties, which was afterwards renewed and confirmed by successive reigning sovereigns. Several of these interesting documents are still in the possession of the Corporation, including an illuminated charter of Richard III.'s reign, and another granted by Edward VI., which is enriched with a quaint, archaic portrait of that youthful Monarch.

Tenby also boasts a handsome pair of silver Maces, presented to the town by Charles II. They are about 2 feet in length, and are emblazoned with the royal arms, the arms of Tenby, and other appropriate devices, with the inscription ' Rice Borrow Maior, 1660.' The upper portion of the head is formed as a moveable lid, so that the Mace could be used upon festive occasions as a loving-cup.

Since those turbulent days of its earlier career, Tenby has played the modest role of a town without a history, and has happily combined the avocations of a fishery town with the seductions of a modern watering-place.

Tenby Parish Church of St Mary 's

Turning out into the steadfast sunshine, we now thread our way amid the intricacies of the older byways to the ' faire Paroche chirche,' whose steeple, soaring high aloft, appears a landmark to mariners far out at sea. Dedicated to St. Mary, this Church is one of the largest and handsomest in the county, and is unrivalled in the beauty and interest of its monuments.

Foremost amongst these are the twin marble monuments in St. Anne's Chapel. Here lie buried several distinguished members of that famous family, the Whites of Tenby, which has given many worthy citizens to the town. Beneath the right-hand tomb rests Thomas White, Merchant and sometime Alderman of Tenby : whose recumbent effigy, habited in the distinctive costume of his calling, adorns the monument. He it was who enabled Henry, Earl of Richmond, to escape after the battle of Tewkesbury, by concealing him in his house at Tenby until such time as he could ship him safely off in one of his own vessels to France. In gratitude for this yeoman service the Earl, upon his accession to the throne, presented his trusty friend with the lease of all the Crown lands around the town. The adjacent monument, which closely resembles its neighbour, records another member of the White family. Both these tombs are enriched with figures, in panels of bold relief, with a running inscription in medieval character carved upon the margin.

Our attention is next attracted by the gaily-tinted effigy of William Risam, who, clad in aldermanic robes, kneels beneath a canopy built into the Chapel wall. The figure is coloured in such a life-like manner that, as the story goes, a Parliamentary soldier fired at the supposed enemy ; in witness whereof a bullet-hole may be discerned above the head of the effigy.

Near at hand lies the last of that ancient family the Vaughans, of Dunraven in South Wales ; a man who, having run through his patrimony at breakneck pace, allowed the ancestral mansion to fall into ruin, and betook himself to a lonely turret upon the seaward cliffs. Here he is said to have spent his time in showing false lights along the coast, in order to lure passing vessels ashore and enrich himself by the plunder of their cargoes. One stormy night, during one of these sinister exploits, the body of his only son was washed ashore at his feet ; when, overcome by this ominous catastrophe, he quitted the neighbourhood, withdrew from all intercourse with his fellow-creatures, and ended his days in seclusion at Tenby.

Standing upon the Chapel floor hard by, we espy a fine old fifteenth -century Church Bell bearing in black-letter characters the words SANCTA ► J" Anna, with the initials K. T. This is the ancient sanctus-Bell of this same Chapel of St. Anne, which has descended to its present lowly position from the exterior of the tower, having been hung there, as is supposed, long years ago by Thomas ap Rhys, of Scotsborough, a descendant of the famous Rhys ap Thomas who played so important a part in the establishment of Henry VII. upon the throne. The memory of this worthy knight is kept evergreen by the gaudy and rather pretentious-looking monument seen on the farther wall. There he kneels, with folded hands, arrayed in ruffles and trunk hose ; his ' better half," who is represented as of gigantic proportions, reposing uncomfortably upon her side ; while in panels beneath appear the sons and daughters, arranged in symmetrical gradation.

Quitting the Church by its massive south porch, we pause beneath the spreading elms that adorn the churchyard to admire a singular group of arches, set in a crumbling fragment of ruined wall, whose gray, time-worn stones are abloom with bright tufts of pink valerian. These appear to be the sole remains of a house of Carmelite nuns, established A.D. 1399 by one John de Swynemore ; and so graceful are these richly-moulded arches that we can but regret that more of the structure has not been spared to us. It is probable that these ruins are of coeval date with the adjacent western doorway of the Church, which has a peculiar ogee arch surmounted with the following inscription in Gothic characters:

BENEDICTUS DELS IN DONIS SUIS.

Rambling haphazard around the little town, such names as Frog Street, Crackwell Street and the like, tickle our fancy as a quaint relief to modern street nomenclature, which, usually devoid of originality, too often supplants local names racy of the soil. A sudden turn down a narrow lane, hanging, as it were, upon the steep hillside, reveals glimpses of old-world Tenby which beguile our wandering steps from the hard highway. At a secluded corner of these by-lanes a gray and weather-beaten old house stands, forsaken and neglected, amid the meaner dwellings that encompass it. The well-proportioned windows and pointed door- way which adorn the massive front lend a certain air of faded dignity, as though the old place had once ' seen better days ' : while above the high-pitched roof peers one of those curious, rounded erections called hereabouts ' Flemish ' chimneys. In conjunction with the ancient gables at the rear of the adjacent saddler's shop, this interesting old structure forms one of the most picturesque relics yet remaining of the Tenby of ' auld lang syne.'

Following hence the groups of stalwart fisher-folk as, with large air of leisure, they stroll adown the Hill, we soon find ourselves upon the ' Peere made for Shyppes ' which encloses the little harbour. Here stood in olden times the seamen's Chapel of St. Julian, which was subsequently converted into a bath-house : thus ' cleanliness comes next to godliness ' ; and a pretty modern Chapel now stands beside the Quay.

Close at hand, in a sheltered cove, the lifeboat lies in wait beside a rudimentary iron ' peere,' which threatens to stretch its spindle shanks athwart the comely crescent of the bay beneath the fortress-crowned islet of St. Catherine.

The adjacent Castle Hill is crowned by a lofty watch-tower, some ruined outworks of the ancient city walls, and a handsome marble statue of the late Prince Consort, of heroic size : lower down stands a small but well-arranged museum, which contains a representative collection of local natural history, besides valuable cases of shells, coins, etc. Archiologists will notice with interest the small alabaster group of St. George and the Dragon, rescued from a cottage in course of demolition at Tenby; and a fine specimen of a quern, used for grinding corn, found near Popton. The exterior is fashioned into the form of a human face, and as it is known that only the earlier examples were ornamented, this quern is considered to be of very high antiquity.

The seaward face of the Hill is laid out in winding walks, with sheltered seats at intervals, where visitors and townsfolk congregate upon the sunny slopes to indulge in a spell of dolce far nicety, or to enjoy the wide panorama of land and sea that lies outspread around.

The return to the town may be varied by strolling along the broad, firm sands beneath curiously contorted rocky cliffs, aglow just now with masses of the white and red valerian. Clambering up a long flight of steps, we soon find ourselves abreast of the massive walls which in olden times protected the town upon its landward side, and terminated upon the precipitous edge of the clift in the quaint, ivy-clad tower that rises right here before us. These ancient walls are still (in spite of hard treatment in bygone times from vandalistic hands) in a Fair state of preservation; and form, with their boldly-projecting towers and broken battlements, the most striking and picturesque feature of the town. They are perhaps seen to the best advantage from near the north-west corner, whence a general coup d'a'il is gained of their respective sides.

Sauntering under the shady trees on the site of the ancient moat, we pass beside the south-west front, to which, as by far the most complete, we now devote our attention. Here we notice how the sturdy round tower which guards the converging angle spreads boldly out at its base ; anon we observe another tower of similar form, through which the easy-going authorities of some past time have actually permitted a huge opening to be hewn to admit the passage of a ropewalk !

A stone's -throw farther on rises the broad bulk of the great St. George's Bastion, marking the entrance to one of the principal town gates, and pierced with five archways, in two of which the grooves for the portcullis may still be discerned. Overhead a gangway ran around the inner face of the wall, which is provided with lancet-holes for the use of archers, and is crowned with the usual corbelled battlements. Altogether this fine old structure presents a most picturesque appearance ; its ancient archways being frequently enlivened by groups of Market folk passing to and fro, while the rough gray stones of its venerable walls are wreathed with masses of flowering plants. A number of shabby dwellings which encumbered the approach have recently been swept away ; one dilapidated old building with curious circular chimneys (said to have been used as a lazaret-house) alone being spared.

Beyond St. George's Bastion rises another ivy-mantled tower, near which we espy a stone panel let into the wall, bearing the superscription ' A " 1558, E. R.' Being interpreted, this inscription records that Tenby walls were repaired in the thirtieth year of good Queen Bess's reign.

Farther on the wall is pierced with a wide open archway, and terminates abruptly upon the precipitous edge of the cliff in a square, battlemented turret bearing a strong family likeness to the Church towers of this locality. The walls seem to have been pierced with a double row of lancet-holes for the use of archers, the upper tier being commanded by a gangway carried upon pointed arches, while the lower row is accessible from the ground.

The Castle and Town walls

The earliest historical buildings of which definite indications exist at the present time in Tenby are the Castle, built in the latter half of the 13th century (probably by William de Valence, who had obtained the earldom of Pembroke by marriage with the daughter of Warine de Munchesney, who himself had married one of the Marshal heiresses) and the walls that encircle the small borough. Of a previous mound Castle not a trace is discoverable, though such a post unquestionably existed, there being record of the burning of the wooden defences several times during the 12th and early 13th centuries. The present Church, in its earliest parts contemporary with de Valence's Castle, has doubtless preceded an earlier building. "This Church, which is revealed to us only by remains of its foundations, appears to be the edifice of which Gerald de Barru [fl 1190] was rector, and Maelgwn ap Rhys destroyer. [c1186]" (Laws, Little England p146). An admirable account of the Castle and attendant mural towers, illustrated by early plans and prints, has been written by Mr Laws, and printed in Arch Camb for July and October , 1896.

Much of the walls and almost all of the towers have been removed, but enough still remains to permit the area of the medieval borough to be traced without difficulty. It need hardly be said that both Castle and town walls have suffered many transformations. A stone in the west wall records one of these in the year 1588, and as the town was a scene of activity in the Civil War of the next century, many of its early features have altogether vanished

NOTES ON THE FORTIFICATIONS OF MEDIAEVAL Tenby. BY Edward LAWS, esq., F.S.A.

The military architecture of Tenby, extant and recorded, falls pretty clearly into five periods : —

1. Such works as were in existence before Tenby was a walled town. These are on the Castle Hill, and were perhaps erected in the twelfth century.
2. Towers, gates, curtains, encircling the town, probably built by Earl William de Valence in the last quarter of the thirteenth century.
3. Additions to and enlargements of the thirteenth century work by Earl Jasper Tudor, 1457.
4. Elizabethan restorations, 1588.
5. A few unimportant alterations made between 1643 and 1648.

Notwithstanding the chronological adaptability of these buildings, it will perhaps be advisable to consider the gates, bastions, and curtains in the order they occur on a plan of the town, so that their original form may be discussed, and attention duly drawn to alterations and insertions. In reconstructing the fortifications of Tenby we can hope for no assistance from map-makers, for the earliest existing plan was drawn in 1811; and though the whole town is included, Corporation property only is dealt with in detail.

The Rev. J. Evans, in a book called Letters written during a Tour through South Wales in the Year 1803, on p. 245 quotes from some unknown author to the following effect: " It (i.e., Tenby) had formerly twenty four bastions, and a parapet- walk wholly round the town; a wall on one side only now remains, having seven bastions, the centre one being much larger than the rest."

In 1803 there certainly were more than seven bastions in existence, without counting those on the Castle Hill ; for there are at the present day nine, if we add the one at Brechmaenchine, and the other near the Sluice, to those enumerated by Mr. Evans' authority. However, it seems he was quite right when he put the original number of bastions at twenty-four.

We have absolutely no description of the work done in the thirteenth century, though, as will be seen presently, there are still considerable remains. The very extensive alterations and reconstructions effected by the orders of Jasper Tudor in 1457 also have to be sought out. His patent states that the walls had been unskilfully built and insufficiently repaired, and orders that they shall be made 6 ft. broad in every part, so that people may be able to walk round them for the purpose of defence. The Mayor, freeholders, and burgesses agree to dense the moat, and make it 30 ft. broad in every part. From this it is evident a moat was part of the original scheme of defence.

Tenby St Mary's Church

The Church of St. Mary, Tenby, formed part of the possessions of the abbey of St. Martin de Seez in Normandy , and was probably included in the gift of St. Nicholas, Pembroke, made about 1098 by Arnulph de Montgomery to that abbey. As was the priory of Monkton at Pembroke.

Church Book of St. Mary the Virgin, Tenby.

This is the largest medieval parish Church in Wales and a testimony to the prosperity of Tenby in the late medieval period. The south doorway and the lower parts of the tower are 13th century, and the SE vestry and north porch are Victorian. The rest is all of c1450-1510. A cruciform two storied west porch built in the 1490s was removed in 1831. The nave has very wide aisles with arcades of five bays. There must have been a south aisle by the 13th century but it was widened c1500 when the chancel arch was removed and coved wagon roofs provided over the nave, chancel, and north Chapel. The north aisle was added in the early 15th century but widened and heightened later. The long chancel is flanked on the north side by the irregularly shaped St Nicholas Chapel of c1475-80 with a three bay arcade and an east window of 1885. On the south side lies the tower, with a later spire rising to 45m, and St Thomas Chapel with a two bay arcade and a piscina probably reset from the chancel.

In the north aisle is a 14th century female effigy, a wall monument to John Moore, d1639, and a 15th century effigy of a skeleton representing John Denby, Archdeacon of St Davids. In the north Chapel are the effigies of a 15th century Merchant; Rector Hugo ap Owen, c1450; Margaret ap Rhys, d1610; and Robert Tully, Bishop of St Davids. The brass of the latter was modern. In the south Chapel are monuments to Thomas White and his son John both 15th century mayors, Ralph Mercer d 1613, William Risam d1633. John Roch, d 1670, Thomas Roch, d1693, and Isabella Verney, d 1465, plus a 15th century font and Bell lettered Sancta Anna. The pulpit is dated 1634. In the churchyard is one wall of a two storey building thought to have been a chantry Chapel with a dwelling room for the priest above it.

The tower was used for centuries, by sailors, as a landmark navigational aid.

CADW

The nave and chancel both have fine 15th century roofs, the chancel roof of 15 x 6 panels is on 16 painted timber angel supporters with shields, each side, on stone 5-sided corbels. The Church houses a number of exceptional 15th-19th century monuments including one to Margaret wife of Thomas Ap Rees of Scotsborough (d 1610) and a 17th century memorial with recumbent figure of a wife below the kneeling figure of husband at prie-dieu, in armour. There are several tomb chests, including one which has small figures of 7 children; an ashlar tomb chest to Bishop Robert Tully of St Davids (d 1482) with marks of a lost brass effigy and canopy, and others of Thomas White (d 1482) and his son John (d c1507), both finely carved figures in contemporary dress, and an effigy of a cadaver of a priest. Fittings include a 15th century font and a further 19th century late Gothic font, a 17th century pulpit and ornate 20th century oak stalls. ----Cadw, Listed Buildings Database

1880 ON CERTAIN MONUMENTAL EFFIGIES IN Tenby Church, SOUTH WALES.

THE Annual Meeting of the Cambrian Archeological Association for the year 1880 having been fixed to be held at Pembroke, it can hardly be doubted but that one of the excursions will be to Manorbeer and Tenby. It is in anticipation of such a visit that I venture to give a few notes on the monumental effigies in Tenby Church, which, though not of a rare class, are yet of a description sufficiently interesting as to draw to them the attention of the antiquary.

1. In the north wall of the north aisle of the Church, beneath an ogee-shaped arch enriched with crockets and a finial, and flanked by crocketed buttresses (the hollow moulding of the canopy containing the four leaved flower at intervals, whilst the soffit of the arch is cinquefoiled), lies the recumbent effigy of a lady. The original and proper position of this effigy has been transposed, and the head of the effigy placed eastward, a fault which ought to be remedied. Her dress consists of a cap and veil with a wimple over her chin; her gown is much abraised, and her sleeves are loose. From within these appear the close-fitting sleeves of the inner vest or garment. The hands are conjoined on the breast, as in prayer. The head is supported by statuettes of two angels, which, as we commonly find them in this position, are much mutilated; the feet also are mutilated.

The stone out of which this effigy is sculptured is of a schistous nature. This monument is of the fourteenth century.

2. Under an arch in the north wall, west of the north door, is a high panelled tomb of the fifteenth century. On this lies the effigy of a corpse, represented as in an emaciated condition. This is partially concealed by a winding-sheet or shroud. The left hand is disposed at the side; the right hand is represented as holding the shroud. The drapery is well designed, and the sculpture is good. The custom of thus representing the body after death, in sculptured effigies, was introduced in the fifteenth century, and examples of this description are sufficiently numerous. The bodies are represented partly nude and partly covered by the shroud. In the sixteenth century the skeleton, "the lively figure of death", was not unfrequently sculptured on monuments; whilst in the seventeenth century effigies representing bodies totally enveloped in shrouds, the face only being visible, are not unfrequently found in our churches.

3. Between the chancel and a chantry Chapel lying southward of it is a high tomb, the south side of which is divided into four recessed compartments with obtuse, ogee-headed canopies. Three of these are filled with sculpture in relief. In the first is represented the figure of a Bishop in pontificalibus, the mitre on whose head is much mutilated. Two small female figures kneel before the Bishop, one of which has the butterfly headress. In the second compartment two similar figures of females are represented as kneeling before a statuette of St. Cathenne. In the third compartment is the figure of a merchant kneeling before a footstool. He is represented with his head bare, wearing a long sidgown with gipciere or purse attached, cap and tippet.

In the fourth compartment is a mutilated inscription. On this tomb lies the recumbent effigy of a merchant. He is represented with his head bare, habited in a long gown, with a vent at the neck disclosing the inner vest. The sleeves of the gown are somewhat full, and cuffed or turned back at the wrists. The gown is belted round the waist, and on the right side is worn the gipciere a good example; the hands are conjoined on the breast, as in prayer. On the left side of the head is a cap attached to a tippet, which latter is worn over the left shoulder, falling down in front. round the neck is worn a collar of rosettes. The head reposes on a peacock, whilst the feet rest against some animal, much mutilated. This is an interesting monument of a late period in the fifteenth century, and may be ascribed to John White.

4. Eastward of the above is another high tomb, of which the south side is divided into four compartments. In the first are sculptured female figures in relief, kneeling before the statuette of some saint, the drapery in which the saint appears is well defined.

In the second compartment is the representation of St. John the Baptist, holding the Agnus Dei. He appears vested in a gown and mantle, with a nimbus round his head. In this compartment also are two female figures kneeling. The third compartment contains, sculptured in relief, a group of seven figures, more or less mutilated; one is of a merchant kneeling in front. In the fourth compartment are sculptured three small figures of corpses, more or less enveloped in winding sheets. At the east end of the tomb a shield is sculptured.

On the top of this tomb lies the recumbent effigy of a merchant. He is represented bareheaded, with clubbed hair. He is clad in a long side gown, open in front at the neck, with the collar turned back and the sleeves cuffed at the wrists. On the right side the gipciere is worn; on the left, hanging over the shoulders, is the tippet, attached to which is the hat. The head reposes on a fish-like animal, and the hands are conjoined in prayer. This monument appears to be of or about the close of the fifteenth century, and may be ascribed to Thomas White.

5. On the left side of the ascent to the altar is the matrix of a brass; the incised effigy of a Bishop, the indents of the mitre, and of the crook of the pastoral staff are clearly visible.

It is for some local archaeologist to determine the probable persons of whom the foregoing monuments are commemorative. Leland in his short description gives us no information. The slab on which was the incised effigy of a Bishop is probably commemorative of Tully, Bishop of St. David's A.D. 1460-1482, who is said to have been buried in this Church. The two high tombs on the south side of the chancel are commemorative of the family of White, celebrated merchants of Tenby towards the close of the fifteenth century. The eastern most being the tomb of Thomas White, some time Merchant and Mayor of Tenby, who died A.D. 1482. The western most that of John White, the date of whose death is not apparent, but was probably later than that of Thomas.

1906 Old Font in Tenby Church Arch Camb

The interesting restoration to the Parish Church at Tenby, in the County of Pembroke, was carried out in January. The ancient perpendicular font, which for more than fifty years has been exposed to all weathers in the adjoining churchyard, has been taken into the Church, and placed in the Chapel of St. Anne's, near the Organ. This font was discarded by a former Rector, and its place taken by a modern one, which was also removed by the late Rector, the Rev. G. Huntington, and given to the Parish Church of Clarbeston, near Narberth, when the Chater family gave the present one as a memorial.

But to return to our old friend. In the year 1882 an attempt was made to interest the parishioners to have this font replaced in the Church. It stood under a tree, on the north-west side of the west door, and so was kept in view of the public gaze; and by some kind friends, as the height of sarcasm, was filled with growing flowers— chiefly "forget-me-nots."

The font is of soft oolite (lime)stone, and consists of two parts : an octagonal basin, 33 ins. in diameter, depth 14 ins., and stem 9 ins., with base of shaft about 5 ins. On removal, it was found necessary to have another base, This base is of limestone, and formerly belonged to a disused drinking- fountain, and was given by the Corporation of Tenby for the purpose for which it is now used. It serves to show that, being of limestone, the basin and base are of different periods. On removing the font from the churchyard, there appeared on the surface of the stem, immediately under the bowl, an octagonal line following the edge of the stem; in it a very interesting Mason's Mark.

Unfortunately, when the font was fastened together, this Mark was hidden; hard cement was carefully avoided, so that when time font is again taken to pieces the Mark will be as fresh as ever.

It has been bonded together by a copper bar, so that there should be no fear of its splitting the stem. The cost of removal was defrayed by Mrs. Thomas Allen, and the work ably carried out by Mr. Morley, borough Surveyor, under the superintendence kindly given by Mr. Edward Laws, F.S.A.

RCAM. Other medieval ecclesiastical buildings

There was also within the parish a Hospital or free Chapel of St John and there was also another Hospital or Spittel for lepers.

Chapel of St Julian

There was a Chapel of St Julian which stood on the Quay at the foot of the Castle. It seems probable that its sole means of support was the offerings of the traders and fishermen who visited it before setting out for a cruise and their safe return there from. According to Mr Laws, it was swept away many years ago. No records relating to it have been discovered.

The Carmelite Friary or Convent

Following Fenton and Norris, Mr Laws (Little England p256) refers to a friary of Carmelites founded by John de Swynemore on 1399, as standing on the western side of the parish Church. Norris has several sketches of a house standing on this site which was called "the Convent" There was certainly some sort of building here in 1490 but there is no ground for associating it with Carmelite friars or nuns. Whatever its medieval purpose it appears to have become the residence of Dr Robert Loughor, chancellor of York, who married Elizabeth ,heirss of John Rastall (d 1585), chief Justice of South Wales. The only surviving feature of the house is a mullion of the large window which is built into the back premises of the modern house (Laws)

The Hospital of St John Baptist

Of this not a vestige remains. It possessed a well which was doubtless regarded as having curative Properties, and was also the main source of the town's water supply. Leland in his notice of the town says " One thing is to be merveled at, there is no well yn the towne yt is said, whereby they be forced to fesh [fetch] theyre water at S Johns without the towne".

The Mawdlens, or Hospital for Lepers

Writing in 1896, Mr Laws observed of this establishment, "Some small remnants yet exist. They consist of a square chimney and some walling" at the present day these have almost completely disappeared. The Chantry Certificate does not contain any details of this charitable foundation.

The present Chapel, dated 1884, was designed by architect George Morgan of Carmarthen and built in the Gothic style with a gable-entry plan, a schoolroom in the basement and flanking turrets. Deer Park is now Grade 2 Listed as a well preserved example of Morgans work.

Ebenezer Baptist Chapel Upper Park Rd, Tenby Marsh road was built in 1830 in the later Vernacular style of the gable-entry type. By 1845 the building was in use as the Sunday School and in 1854 the denomination changed to Primitive Methodist and in 1881 the building became a Salvation Army Citadel.

Tabernacle Chapel, in Lower Frog St/Tenby town was built in 1822, remodelled in 1837 and in 1869 sold to the Calvinistic Methodists. In 1886 the front was remodelled and raised, a schoolroom built in 1892 and in 1894 the interior renovated with new windows and a new roof. The present Chapel building, dated 1886, is built in the Sub-Classical and Simple Gothic style with a gable-entry plan. During the late twentieth century Tabernacle closed and the building was converted for use as a childrens indoor activity centre. The CADW Grade 2 Listing is for the design of the Chapel front and its prominence in the townscape.

Stone Structures Domestic RCAM

The delightful natural situation of the town made it a favourite resort of the neighbouring gentry and wealthy Merchant princes of the Tudor period whose handsome residences remained until the beginning of the 19th century, though in a state of steady declension towards complete ruin and decay. Our illustrations afford an excellent impression of the pleasing examples of Tudor domestic architecture in Tenby at the opening of the modern era.

Roman Coins Finds RCAM

“In 1878 a coin of Vespasian was dug up on the Esplanade in Juxtaposition with goat and small ox bones. Two years afterwards a silver Bactrian coin was discovered close by. It lay two feet under the surface, and was unearthed while the workmen were digging out the foundation for Mentmore House , immediately opposite the new archway made in the town wall near the south west corner. It is a drachma of Menander, King of Bactria, in the 2nd century B.C. The authorities in the coin department of the British Museum, who kindly identified the coin for me, insist that it cannot possibly have been found in Britain; but for all that it was, and what is more, seems to have been placed where it was discovered in the 1st century AD It is in the Tenby museum with the Vespasian. (I mayself saw the latter dug up Laws Little England p44). Other Roman coins found at Tenby, and in the museum there , include a Marcus Aurelius Probus Carausius (found on St Margaret’s Island, Diocletian).

Nothing could be learnt of the present whereabouts of these articles.

By the early part of the 19c Scotsborough was largely ruinous - west front was converted into Cottages for working people but about

The House Of Scotsborough,By Edward Laws, esq... F.S.A. 1906

The reappearance of a building lost to sight for eighty years is a somewhat unusual occurrence. Such, however, has been the fate of Scotsborough House, by Tenby town.

During the first quarter of the nineteenth century this old mansion was in a ruinous condition, but the west front had been patched up, and converted into cottages. A terrible epidemic of confluent small-pox broke out in these tenements in or about the year 1824, and such of the occupants as did not die fled in panic from the place.

Since that time, Scotsborough has not been inhabited, and for many years after the small-pox outbreak was looked on as an accursed place.

In Pembrokeshire, ivy makes rapid and enormous growth ; and in the course of years so prodigiously had vegetation spread that it quite concealed two sides of the building at Scotsborough, and so masked the remainder that window-spaces and chimneys were hidden from view.

Mr. Stokes (the owner) has had the ivy and brushwood cut back, so that now it is possible not only to make out windows and doors, but to trace bondings, and so differentiate the dates of buildings.

Scotsborough stands on the eastern shore of the eastern branch of an inlet called Ritec in the Liber Landavensis. At several periods this creek has been reclaimed from the sea by man, with but indifferent success.

When well-to-do folks abandoned Scotsborough, its grounds were still lapped by the sea. Now, the tide has been shut out, but the land reclaimed is little better than a snipe-bog. There are indications which pretty conclusively prove that the earliest dwelling, or dwellings, on this site were defended by earthworks.

These fortifications were probably erected to protect the inhabitants from pirates, who scourged the western seas until Elizabethan times.

Apparently, the oldest masonry standing is a large room. It was entered by a well-marked Early English door. This is concealed in by a comparatively modern porch, and the matrix of a second is to be seen on the southern side. In the north-east corner is the base of a small round tower, which covered the entrance door, and served as a stairway to an upper chamber, which had certainly one original deeply-splayed light. In the eastern wall of this upper chamber a long, low Tudor window has been inserted.

In the angle formed by the little tower and the eastern wall of chamber a wall has been built up, part of the fortification of a ward or ‘ Bailey,' shaped like an inverted t; the house itself forming the top of the letter L. This wall is pierced with triangular loops, to serve arbalasts. Now, the cross-bow went out of fashion in the beginning of the fourteenth century, so these loops give a rough date. To the southward of chamber is a room vaulted, and had an upper chamber. The lower chamber was connected by doors with an open courtyard. The chamber above have a turret in the corner, divided into two stories by a vault. The upper was, perhaps, a garderobe ; the lower a store, or lock-up. This portion of the house is not bonded to the Early English room. It was evidently built as a fortress, and the eastern wall is a fighting front, pierced with loops and covered by the T;-shaped ward.

In the south wall of the vaulted chamber is an opening (window or door), which gave ingress and egress to and from the T;-shaped ward in times of danger. This opening was covered by a loop in the turret, so closely placed that a pike or spear could be used to defend the opening.

The vaulted chamber is connected with and bonded into a crenellated wall, which forms the southern side of the little courtyard.

In this wall was once a large gate, which has entirely disappeared. On the western side of the great gate the building of the second period ends, and that of the third begins. This latter is purely domestic, and has no military features at all. It extends along the whole of the western front. The basement seems to have been divided into three chambers and a turret had huge chimneys. The former has fallen; the latter is of that circular sort common in South Pembrokeshire, and erroneously called Flemish. It is not bonded to the buildings.

This was the part of the house which was converted into cottages. There are no details left in these basement rooms, but upstairs are the remains of a fine chimney-piece which probably heated the great Hall.

The windows of the third house resembled the chimney-piece in configuration. One may be seen on the north front, and there are indications showing that the western front had the same sort of light. These, however, were blocked up, and mean cottage windows substituted. The architects built a porch, in front of the Early English door. Over this was a room, and the stables,

The Owners of Scotsborough.

The affix " Scot " occurs in several Pembrokeshire place-names: Scotch Wells, Colby Scot, Scotland Wood, etc. ; but as Scotts never were a landowning family in the county, most likely the word is not personal, but means " tax," or "* payment," as in the phrases " Scot- free," " Scot-and-lot."

The earliest owners of Scotsborough on record are the Perrots. Lewis Dwnn gives two pedigrees of this family, A generation seems to be missing between John, who died in 1349, and Thomas Perrot, of Scotsborough, who negotiated the truce with Owain Glyndwr, in 1405. Irrespectively of these pedigrees, the earliest notice concerning a Scotsborough Perrot seems to be the grave-slab commemorating Isabella Verney, wife of John Perrot, in Tenby Church. She died in 1413; but there is a document among the Corporation (Tenby) papers by which John Chepman conveys Saltern and other lands to Thomas Perrot, of Scotsborough, and Alicia his wife; and as it is dated 3 Henry V, i.e., 1415, and witnessed by Philip Smith, Mayor of Tenby in that year, Isabella must have died in the lifetime of her father-in-law, and his second wife Alicia. A Robert Perrot was bailiff of Tenby in 1454, and Mayor in 1458 ; and a Jenkyn Perrot was killed in the Battle of Banbury, 1469.

John Perrot, of Scotsborough, was Sheriff for Pembrokeshire in 1551. He is also styled as of Cornish Down. He was son of William by Anne, daughter of Thomas Wyrriott, and married Jane, daughter of John Lloyd , of Tenby, and had an only daughter, Catherine, who married John ab Rhys, of Rickeston. This account is taken from Allen's Sheriffs of Pembrokeshire and does not quite accord with the story told by Lewis Dwnn. to ascertained facts. Catherine died the 17th day of September, 1614, and was buried in Gumfreston Church. With her disappeared the Perrots of Scotsborough, after an occupation of something over two centuries.

John ap Rhys, who married the Perrot heiress, Catherine, was a great-grandson of Sir Rhys ap Thomas , through a bastard line. He probably was buried in Gumfreston Church, by the side of his wife, Catherine Perrot, though there is no inscription on the stone.

John ap Rhys, the new owner of Scotsborough, served as Sheriff for Pembrokeshire in 1582. He was succeeded by his son Thomas, who married Margaretta Mercer in 1598 (see her tomb in Tenby Church). The Mercers had been friendly with the ap Rhys family for some time. In 1596, Alban, eldest son of George Owen, Lord of Kemes, married Lettice (or Miriam), daughter of William Mercer, deceased : and Maximilian Mercer, of Ewelme, in the County of Oxford, was co-trustee with John ap Rhys of the marriage settlement Margaretta seems to have been sister to Madam Alban Owen ; and Rudolph Mercer, who married Anne, daughter of Edmund Smith, Rector of Tenby (see tomb in Tenby Church), was son of Maximilian Mercer, Margaretta's brother. Thomas ap Rhys was Sheriff in 1610, and the same year lost his wife in childbed, she having borne her husband ten children.

Thomas buried her under a very elaborate monument in Tenby Church, on which is much heraldry.

Thomas ap Rhys seems to have lived to a good old age. and it was perhaps his senility that saved Scotsborough from destruction during the Civil War. Almost every house in Pembrokeshire that was capable of defence was beleaguered during that disastrous period ; but though Tenby town on one side, and Trefloyne on the other, bore full brunt of war, Scotsborough seems entirely to have escaped, and is not even mentioned in despatches. We find from "Mercurius Aulicus," September 26th, 1643, that Thomas Price, esq., with other notabilities, signed an address, in which they declared that they would, to the utmost of their power, endeavour to reduce Pembroke Town and Castle to His Majesty's obedience, and to the utmost of their power preserve this county from incursions of shipping ; " but it does not follow that Thomas ap Rhys was a Royalist because he signed this document addressed to Lord Carbery, for nearly all of the twenty-four signatories at one time or other bore arms against the King .

Thomas was married in 1598, so he must have been getting on for seventy when he signed this letter, and that was at the commencement of the war.

Perrot ap Rhys succeeded his father Thomas, and married the sister of Sir Thomas Littleton, .

They left two sons, John and James. It is not very clear which was the eldest. John took Scotsborough, James, Rickerston ; but as James served as Sheriff in 1655, and John not at all, it rather looks as if James were the elder brother.

John, at all events, succeeded to Scotsborough, and married Elizabeth Newsham, of Abersanan, county Carmarthen, and died June 2nd, 1672, aged thirty-seven. (See legend painted on Scotsborough monument in Tenby Church by his widow.) His brother James, of Rickerston, who married Anne, daughter of Sir Rice Rudd, of Aberglasney, Bart., was already dead, so James, the son of John and Elizabeth, reunited the Properties. He seems to have taken Rickerston for himself, and left Scotsborough to his aunt.

From a document among the Tenby Corporation Papers, we find that she prosecuted one Henry Philp in 1682: in that he, Henry Philp, had violently broken into her property, called the Old walls, and carried thence one pig and one sow, to the value of forty shillings. James ap Rhys, of Rickerston and Scotsborough, served as Sheriff in 1688. He married Elinor Powell, of Ludchurch.

October 3rd, 1681, James ap Rice, of Rickerston, granted to the Tenby Corporation lands known as the Cornish Park and Causey Park, but by endorsement reserves the quarry and limekiln in the Clicketts for himself.

September 5th, 1682, James ap Rhys and Eleanor his wife mortgaged Scotsborough to Griffith Dawes, of Bangeston.

In 1689, James ap Rhys and Griffith Dawes let Scotsborough for a term of ninety-nine years to Thomas Smyth, gent., Jane his wife, and Jane his daughter.

On October 8th, 1706, James ap Rhys, of Tenby, and Cecilia his wife, eldest son and heir of James ap Rhys, late of Rickerston, sells the freehold of Scotsborough to John Rickson, of Pembroke, Merchant. So passes away the ap Rhys dynasty. According to Fenton (p. 40), Rickerston was also sold early in the eighteenth century, in consequence of the failure of issue. He adds : " When I visited it, about twenty years ago {i.e., 1790}, I was told by some of the old inhabitants, who had heard it from their fathers, that in that court had often been seen three or four coaches and six at the same time, and that the family were known to attend the parish Church of Brawdy in such an equipage."

Be this as it may, probably the failure of cash rather than issue led to the sale of Scotsborough and Rickerston by James ap Rhys and his wife Cecilia — for it must be noted he calls himself the eldest son of his father James. Certainly, in 1770, an unknown Elizabeth ap Rhys restored the Mercer tomb in Tenby Church.

To return to Scotsborough. Thomas Smyth, gent., in a deed dated July 12th, 1693, underlet Scotsborough to Henry Hilling, yeoman ; the aforesaid Henry Hilling, of Scotsborough, yeoman, disposed of his interest to Walter Middleton, esq., of Tenby. The lease under which they held was for lives, not for a term. It extended to ninety-nine years, if either John Smyth, Jane his wife, or Jane his daughter, should live so long. When it expired we know not, but as there was no clause enforcing repairs, it proved to be the destruction of the mansion.

The freehold remained in the hands of the Rickson family until 1764, when a William Rickson conveyed Scotsborough to his brother-in-law. Rev. Hugh Thomas, D.D., Master of Christ College, Cambridge.

Dr. Thomas left the property to his son William, whose widow having (March 19th, 1800) married Mathew Campbell, esq.. (cousin of the first Baron Cawdor), settled Scotsborough, under certain trusts, on Richard Parry, junior.^ September 3rd, 1810, Richard Parry sold Scotsborough to John Owen, of Orielton, esq.. This gentleman, who was created a baronet in 1813, sold on February 13th, 1817, to Jacob Richards, esq., of Tenby.

Charles William Rees Stokes, and his wife Harriette Jane, daughter of the late Rev. John Phelps, one time Vicar of Carew and grand-daughter of Jacob Richards, purchased Scotsborough from the representatives of William Henry Richards, deceased, who was grandson of the aforesaid Jacob.

Mr. C. W. R. Stokes is one of the Rees family, originally coming from Roch, who claim descent from David Rhys, of Rickerston : so that the old house of Scotsborough has again become the property of the old family.

Sites of Historical Interest

Lady Well

Two fields on Moysland Farm, on which is a strong spring now utilised for the water supply of Tenby. A few years ago some ruined walls were visible near the spring, and in the vicinity was found a white carnelian seal bearing a mitre and coat of arms of which nothing could be learned visited 8th April 1915

Tenby Pier

The mediaeval pier built 1328 curved west and had the fisherman's Chapel of St Julian dating possibly from the 15 century at the end.

The Chapel became baths in 1781 and was demolished in 1842 when the pier was rebuilt to the present shape, the old pier being within the new larger structure which extends straight North west from the bottom of Pier Hill Stone pier with parapet on seaward side and granite large coping stones on harbour side. rough and irregular seaward side has various masonry breaks. Steps down at extreme left, next section built on rough and very large boulders, then a projecting rounded bastion, then further stretch of irregular masonry before pier-head projecting NE to seaward with 19century squared grey limestone masonry to battered walls and curved corners. Inner face is all of squared limestone with granite coping stones. One broad flight of steps down inset towards the left end. Raised square platform at seaward end with granite edging. Three cast iron bollards marked David & Co Foundry Saundersfoot and one former Cannon. Seaward side parapet has rough stone coping, plaque records rebuilding after storm of 1896. Large boulders visible low down on the seaward side of the Pier could be ancient.

Prince Albert Memorial

The memorial to Prince Albert, Tenby, was erected in 1864-5 as the Welsh National Memorial to the consort of Queen Victoria, who died in 1861; a counterpart to statues in Edinburgh and Dublin. It is a Sicilian marble statue of the prince in uniform designed by John Evan Thomas (1810-73) on a tall pedestal and a square platform of grey limestone. The proposal to erect the Welsh national memorial in Tenby was made by the mayor, anxious that Tenby should take the lead in Wales.

The standing figure is some 2.7m tall, in uniform, with the mantle and collar of the Order of the Garter and holds a field-marshal's baton. The pedestal is robustly detailed with battered sides, chamfered Angles and a heavy cornice. Coved lower moulding between large recumbent console scrolls extending out diagonally. On the pedestal are 4 tablets of white marble with arms of the Prince Consort, of the princes of Wales, the monogram of Victoria and Albert supported by a Welsh dragon, and to the front an inscription: 'Albert Dda, Priod Ein Gorhoffus Frenhines Victoria Albert the Good Consort of our Beloved Queen Victoria'. The high plinth has a front inscription recording the dates of foundation and unveiling, and the rear inscription reads: 'Born 26.8.1819 Died 14.12.1861.

The white marble has eroded significantly.

After the confiscation of alien priories and abbeys in 1441

After the confiscation of the property of alien abbeys, in England and Wales the priory of Pembroke, which held the advowson of St. Mary , Tenby, was granted in 1414 by the crown to Humphrey de Lancaster, duke of Gloucester and Earl of Pembroke, who on 7 June, 1441, gave the same to the abbey of St. Albans. -Whethamstede, Vol.1. p. 46.

The Abbot of St Alban's passed the Church on to his sisters in the Convent of St Mary de la Pre. This convent had been founded by King John "for the health of his own, his ancestors and his heirs souls and built for God, lepers and diseased women" in a meadow near St Albans.

1484 May. This year John Morton, Cardinal Arch Bishop of Canterbury, obtained a Bull from Pope Alexander VI, authorising him to visit and inspect the religious houses of the realm, as great irregularities were reported. The result of this visitation was a letter addressed to the Abbot of St. Alban's informing him that the state of affairs in the nunnery of de la Pre was most unsatisfactory. "The Abbess, Elena Germyn, was a married woman who had separated from her husband, and had lived in adultery with another man; at present she was the mistress of Father Thomas Sudbury, and the convent was run as a brothel." (Acc/to Laws it seems more than probable that Elena Germyn, or rather her husband came from Tenby, for this was a well-known name in the town during the first half of the sixteenth century).

As we all know the authorities of the Church work very slowly either that or the Convent had some very powerful or satisfied friends for it was not until 1528 that there was an order from the Pope; "in as much as we learn the discipline is greatly relaxed in the Monastery of the nuns of the meadow.... it must be wholly suppressed and the Properties, farms and all rights must be returned to the Monastery of St Albans".

1471. Jasper and Henry Tudor defeated at Tewkesbury and fled to Tenby. Thomas White, Mayor of Tenby assisted by the then rector hid them in the White's mansion cellars (under Boots the Chemist) then helped them flee to France . Henry returned later to become the first Tudor King. There was supposed to be a passage from the Church to the House of a Merchant family called White

Today it seems very strange to realise that his mother Margaret, gave birth to Henry 8 months after she was widowed, when her husband had been executed and she was only 15 at the time of the birth.

1539. Dissolution of Monasteries and St Mary's Church passed to the Crown. On the surrender on 5 Dec., 1539, of the abbey of St. Albans to the Crown the advowson of St. Mary, Tenby, came into the hands of the King, who presumably granted it, or probably only the right of the next presentation, to William Gwynne, a priest and Parson of St. Nicholas Cole Abbey (London), and he by his will, dated 26 Oct., 1540, bequeathed the advowson of Tynby to his nephew William Rogers.

1656 10 July. The Commonwealth approved of the union of the parishes of Tenby and Gumfreston. - State Papers.

1668. Guns and ammunition stored in the Church.

1711 18 September. Licence was granted by Queen Anne, on the petition of the inhabitants of Tenby, for the consolidation of the rectory and vicarage of St. Mary , Tenby, into one rectory to be called the Rectory of the Parish Church of St. Mary, Tenby. The patronage of which was reserved to the Crown. On the death of Roger Lloyd, the last sinecure rector, John Howell was instituted in 1712 to the consolidated rectory.

1770-1 or 1772-3. [Thomas Williams was mayor in 1770-1 and 1772-3]. The Mayor, Justice, Common Council, burgesses and inhabitants of the borough and Parish of St Mary, Tenby, to Charles [Moss], Bishop of St Davids.

Petition

Humbly sheweth unto your lordship that we have lived in a very unhappy state in regard to our religious worship since our present rector has come here, whose vociferous method of preaching is truly disagreeable to us. And though we have made frequent applications to him to preach by notes as his worthy predecessor always did, and all other Clergymen of the Church of England still do, yet he obstinately persists in following his methodistical custom of preaching extempore, and that so harsh and unintelligible to all capacities as he has prevented many well disposed Christians from frequenting the Church. This obstinate behaviour of our rector being truly grievous to your petitioners, they, by their churchwarden presented him in your lordship's court at Haverfordwest at your lordship's last visitation, and also at two subsequent courts.

In order to prevent your petitioners from having justice done then, our rector has for these two years last past, elected one Thomas Howells (a man of a despicable character) to be his churchwarden who acts agreeable to the rector's desire and has in his presentment contradicted your petitioners churchwarden's presentment. As your petitioners have hitherto had no redress, we humbly apprehend we have no other method of being relieved but by applying to your lordship by petition. Your petitioners humble hope that your lordship will take their unhappy case into consideration; unhappy, we may truly say, as we cannot go to our own Church with any comfort to hear his thundering incoherent doctrine, and grant us such relief as to your lordship shall see fit. (There were about 70 signatories.)

There is a memorial in St Mary's Church to Robert Recorde, he died in a debtor's goal. Robert Recorde the mathematician was born in Tenby. He introduced algebra into England and was the first to use the signs +, and =. His book "The whetstone of witte or the second Part of Arithmetike", 1557 on algebra, is mentioned by Sir W. Scott in his book "The fortunes of Nigel."

Another is to Peggy Davies the old bathing woman.

1809. Peggy Davies, bathing woman died in the sea aged 82.

One with a connection to Pembroke is that to Dr Reid (Reid Douglas Arthur MD. JP.) who served in the Crimea with the 90th Regiment and at his death was the last medical officer to have served in that conflict. He died in London March 22nd 1924 at the age of 90. Previously his wife died in Tenby in 1912 age 74. They had 3 sons. Previously he had a practice in Pembroke and gave medical attention to the accident on Westgate Hill Pembroke in which two people lost their lives.

The old house - Tudor Merchants house.

Last survivor of the many fine Tudor mansions that formerly adorned Tenby. Dates chiefly from the 15c or early 16c and originally formed part of a much larger building including the houses on either side, approached by what are now blocked doorways. Built of stone with round Flemish chimney contains some original fireplaces and windows. On the one remaining original partition on the ground floor under 23 coats of whitewash was discovered some painted decoration on the plaster in red, black and White.

St Catherine's Island. {Roman Coins}

St Catherine's Island is a half-tide coastal islet. St Catherine's Fort is set upon St Catherine's Island which borders south beach in Tenby. The Fort dates from 1868-71, and the remains of St Catherine's Chapel were reportedly demolished during its construction. It was one a chain of Palmerstonian forts built to protect the Admiralty's ship-building yards at Pembroke Dock, this imposing structure cost £50,000 to build and was manned by 100 men and officers.

The ancient Chapel site is located within the south-eastern section of St Catherine's Island and is thought to have been dedicated to St Catherine It is mentioned in documents of 1525 and 1585 and its remains in 1812 were said to have overhung the further end of the isle. The Chapel was demolished in 1868-1871 when three third century AD Roman coins were discovered during the construction of the fort. Besides the 19 century fort an 20th century gun platform was constructed with a concrete base to mount a 4in quick fire gun surrounded by a low concrete wall complete with magazine .

Education (The Blue Book) 1847

I WAS in this town during the Christmas holidays, and found no schools in operation. It appears to be well supplied with schools, and to have considerable resources for maintaining them. WM. Morris, Assistant Evidence of Dr. Falconer, M.D.

There are three society's for mutual assistance in tho town. The funds of the three amount to between £1200. and £1300. The members are 326; nearly all from the town and immediate neighbourhood. These clubs, besides the more direct benefits of them, are useful in teaching habits of business to the members. In one of them, when they take their degrees (the Ivorites), tho members are bound to sign their names; this is generally well done; out of 50 or 60 only two put marks!. Many of them as officers in the clubs have to read documents; in this they are rather deficient. The younger children are sent to school, but the feeling of the parents is chiefly to get them out of the way. The elder are kept at home as soon as they can earn anything.

The Dissenters make no objection to sending their children during the week, but as soon as they grow up they attend Chapel. The Infant-school receives more support than the National from visitors and voluntary teachers. There is abundant school accommodation in the town. Several attempts have been made to establish mechanics' institutes in the town, and for lending libraries. These attempts have generally failed: there is, however, still a book club of 200 volumes on subjects connected with the professions of various mechanics; the books are well used and read. The lower classes are very fairly off. Their character is generally good, except the sailor population, who are some of them a very bad set. There are 20 or 30 boats, with three men to a boat. Few of their children go to school. There is no foundation for the reports of wrecking in this neighborhood. The people are very honest. This may in some degree be connected with the system of "bundling," which must be discontinued if the visitors were dishonest.

Bastardy is less frequent here than elsewhere in Wales.

There is a great disposition to subscribe for charitable purposes in Tenby. •

National School.-

I visited the building in which this school is held on the 29th of December. It is part of the old Castle, and occupies the extremity and summit of a rocky promontory. It is approached by a path winding upwards from the town through the ruined walls. The school is held in two rooms, the upper for the girls, and the lower, which is flagged, for the boys. The rooms are commodious and the windows command fine sea-views. The spot is exposed, but must be very healthy. The path approaching it runs along the edge of the cliff towards its upper end, where it is fenced with a very low wall, and would be considered highly dangerous for English children. In the boys' school there are a black board, cards on the walls, maps of the World, of England, three of Palestine, of the wanderings of the Israelites in the Wilderness, and a table of chronology. The writing was good. There were no prints of any kind.

Attendance on Sunday is not enforced; few however of the parents keep their children away on that day, though themselves Dissenters. No Child can attend the Sunday who does not attend the day school. The master considers that this works ill for the Sunday-school, and that more would attend it if it were not restricted by this condition.

Infant School I visited the building in which this school is held on the 29th of December. I did not find the school in operation. The master had just given up his situation and was going to conduct an infant-school under the Rev. Wm. Curl in, St Saviours., Southwark. The school is something more than an infant-school. The premises are very good and convenient. There are reading and spelling cards on the walls, a clock, maps of the World, Europe, Asia, and Palestine, as well as a large sheet covered with pictures of animals drawn in their relative sizes. There is a small playground attached, containing a stepping-board, a circular swing, and see-saws with backed seats on them, Captain Cook's School.- The schoolroom is a ground-floor room in a stone-built and slated home. The furniture consisted of the Captain's desk, two large desks, two tables, a clock, and five benches. Most of his pupils are tradesmen's, mechanics', and (a few of them) labourers' children.

Few only were present, and these (it was said) not the best scholars.

The 14th chapter of Romans was read. No answers could be had from the chapter. The Captain is not in the habit of questioning his scholars when reading the Scripture!, He professes to understand the classics, several branches of the mathematics, and French (having been a prisoner in France nine years, from 1805 till the general peace In 1814). To questions proposed by me the scholars said that Pembrokeshire is bounded on the E. by Carmarthenshire, on the S. by the Bristol Channel-called so because it is the channel that takes us to Bristol-on the W. by the Irish sea-because Ireland is the other side.

Captain Cook informed me that only 20 seafaring men are engaged in the coast trade, who get from 40s. to 45s. a-month with provisions. The fishermen's earnings are very uncertain. About 100 are employed in this trade in the summer season: 20 men are employed in trolling, which, here, means dragging a large net with a 30-foot beam to spread it at the bottom; and 20 more in small boats, fishing and piloting. Did not know their earnings. Dec.30th, 1846. WM. Morris, Assistant.

Mr. Eddy's School.-The master speaks very correctly, having been, and still occasionally being a preacher with the Independents, He complained that his school had fallen off lately Some of the copy-books were fairly written.

December 30th,1846. WM. Morris, Assistant

Miss FitzSimmonds's School.-The mistress appeared a very amiable and intelligent person, who had received a superior education,and profited by it.

December 30th, 1846. WM. Morris, Assistant.

Mrs. Griffiths's School.-The mistress appeared to be a clever woman. She had taught navigation to many captains of vessels. She expressed herself well.

Several of the copy-books were nicely written.

December 30th 1846. WM. Morris, Assistant.

Sunday School.-Ebenezer School.-On the 27th of December, 1846, I visited this Sunday- school, which belongs to the Baptists. The one superintendent present (the other being in Bristol) informed me that the Sunday-school and everything connected with that Chapel had been greatly injured by the drunken habits of the late minister. There is no stated minister here at present. The congregation is supplied with ministers from Pembroke, Narberth, and Haverfordwest. The inclement weather, he said, had also had an injurious effect on the school-all the scholars had not been present since the late snow. I found only 2 classes present reading in the New Testament, collectively, and 2 elementary classes, taught simultaneously. One Testament class read the 13th chapter of St. Matthew tolerably well, and to questions proposed by the superintendent said that the seed in "the parable meant the Word of God-the sower, those who preach the Gospel-stony ground, wicked people-did not know what sort of people the thorns nor the wayside meant-good ground meant good people-those who receive the Word of God into their hearts. The other class Read the 16th chapter or St. Luke, about the 'unjust steward'-did not know who was meant by him- no ready answer could be had in either class. All the scholars present, and those who belong to the school, are under 15 years of age,

To questions proposed by the superintendent at the close of the school the scholars said that --Adam was the first man--God made him- Eve the first woman- Adam was made of the dust of the earth- Eve formed of one of Adam's ribs-Jesus Christ is the second Adam-he is the Son of God-died on the cross for sinners-is able to save to the uttermost those that come to God through him. A little girl recited an anniversary hymn and the 'Happy Negro,' after which the teachers and scholars sang a few verses, the superintendent prayed, and the school was dismissed.

Wesleyan. School. On the 27th of December, 1846, I visited this school. When I entered the superintendent was engaged in prayer. Having concluded, the scholars resumed their seats, and teaching commenced. There were three classes reading the Scriptures collectively; the elementary classes were taught, principally, by the individual mode.

All the scholars, both those present and those absent were under 15 years of age. There was no fire in the Chapel, although the weather was bitterly cold. One female class read the 12th chapter of 2 Samuel. The teacher declined asking questions,

The girls in this class read with great ease.

Another class (boys) Read the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel,

. At this time the Rev. Mr. Woolmer came in; the books were collected. a girl, apparently about 13, repeated the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes very correctly to the minister, after which he addressed the school on the Incarnation of Christ. He then gave out a hymn (which was sung) prayed, and the school was dismissed

Quakers Tenby -

In the latter half of the year 1657, George Fox, the Quaker, visited Tenby.

He was well received, a Justice of the Peace desired Fox to stay at his house, and the Mayor and Mayoress attended his meeting. One John ap John, a fervent Quaker, left the meeting-house and strolled into the parish Church, where he was arrested by order of the Governor. When Fox heard of this he sought out the Governor, and inquired why his friend was cast into prison. — "Governor: " For standing with his hat on in the Parish Church. "

A long dialogue ensued, which ended most satisfactorily for the Quakers.

John ap John was released, and the Governor asked Fox to dinner. They went back afterwards to the house of the magistrate, and he with the Mayor and their respective wives, and several other persons, accompanied the friends to the water side, about half a mile from the town, when prayers were said. Edward Laws Arch Camb 1898

1671. Petition from Tenby to Charles II for suppression of a Market in Narberth.

1676. His Majesty (Charles II) retaining a gracious memory of the constant loyalty of that town and how much they suffered in the late times for their fidelity to his royal father and likewise considering the convenience and usefulness of the harbour there for trade and the reception and security of ships in time of danger and that divers able seamen are there bred for his majesties service upon all occasions ordered that no patent be given for a Market at Narbeth.

1688. Letters patent granted Narberth a weekly Market and three annual fairs.

1697. The bomb vessel BLAST made port November 5th, separated from the rest of the fleet on her way back from Newfoundland by stormy weather, spent 2 months waiting for a new mast to be fitted. From Princes, pigs and people of Tenby by Wendy Osborne.

1711. James Callow was Tenby's first postmaster for £6 per year.

1721. Thomas Athoe was mayor and was later hanged for murdering his nephew. Journeying home to Manorbier one night from a troublesome day at the Market in Tenby he murdered his nephew. There had been family rivalry for a while and the dark and narrow bridge over the Ritec was too good an opportunity for settling the quarrel. His trial and execution brought a certain notoriety to the town as he was found innocent by a court in Pembroke and it took the Court of the Kings Bench in Westminster and a New Act of Parliament ordaining that all murders or robberies committed in, on or about the borders of Wales should be tried in any county in England, to finally bring him to justice.

The first Wesleyan sermon was preached at the Market Cross by Thomas Taylor one of Wesley's lay Readers. His advent seems to have been peculiarly repugnant to the Mayor, who is said to have instigated a disturbance, which served as a pretext for the reading of the Riot Act and the arrest of the Evangelist, who was strictly charged by the Justices to preach no more in the town. But the injunction was immediately disregarded. John Wesley was in Tenby in 1763 and again in 1784. Of the first occasion he wrote: --We reached Tenby about 11 o'clock; the rain then ceased, and I preached at the cross to a congregation gathered from many miles around. The record of the second visit is:--We reached Tenby soon after one. In the evening I preached in the street to a large congregation of rich and poor, all quiet and attentive 1765. Tenby and Haverfordwest between them shipped 807 tons of coal to London.

1767. Five Arches originally St George's Gate Sir J. Banks wrote in his diary:

"The gate seems well constructed for defence as there is one gate in the tower and another into the town; so that when the tower gate is forced, that of the town is still to be attacked, and by no more men than can stand in the tower, where they must be subject to the offensive weapons of the besieged".

It only escaped destruction in 1873 through the efforts made by a public spirited resident who appealed to the Court of Chancery and obtained an injunction against the local vandals.

1767. Sir Joseph Banks also records that he saw within the walls most complete ruins of the old town, two large Streets, the houses still standing though unroofed.

1780. Tenby Poor wore three inch red letters on their shoulders. From Princes, pigs and people of Tenby by Wendy Osborne.

1780. The Last service in St Julian's Fishermans Chapel on the old pier where fishermen used to assemble before setting out for the fishing grounds, to hear prayers offered up for a good haul and a safe return. Offerings of 4d from each man and 1d for each ship, and tithes of fish and oysters were paid to the Rector of St Mary's for his services. When the fishermen became less devout it was proposed that services should be abandoned, the rector, it is said was agreeable to this but still required the payment of the tithes. He agreed finally to a sum in compensation. It is believed that this was the last place in Wales where such services were held.

1781. Dr John Jones of Haverfordwest leased St Julian's Chapel and turned it into a bath house.

1781. The North gateway, badly damaged by the civil war and now in the way of traffic was pulled down. (Site now occupied by the Gatehouse and Lion Hotel.)

1784. "Tis observed by the mayor and council that great numbers of pigs are suffered to go about the Streets of this borough, which is become an insufferable nuisance to the inhabitants thereof. Tis therefore thought necessary to appoint two constables to impound all pigs that shall be found going about the Streets and environs of this borough in the common pound". From Princes, pigs and people of Tenby by Wendy Osborne.

1790. The mayors accounts show 15s a week paid to ringers for teaching the town ringers to ring the new Church bells to prevent their being broken.

1802. Lord Nelson and the Hamiltons visited Tenby for a performance of the Mock Doctor at the Blue Ball Inn in Frog St . They had been visiting Hamilton lands around Milford Haven and dined at Amroth Castle.

A fellow guest noticed that Lady Hamilton was attired in a White cotton Indian dress, red morocco waistband fastened with a diamond buckle, red morocco slippers and diamond buckles,. Nelson devoted himself to her the greater part of the evening.

The three then spent some time and £8 13s in Tenby where Mr Gore, a strolling player also in the town, wrote of - an exhibition which though greatly ridiculous was not wholly so for it was likewise pitiable and this was in the persons of two individuals who have lately occupied much public attention; I mean the Duke of Bronte, Lord Nelson and Emma, Lady Hamilton. The whole town was at their heels as they walked together. The lady is grown immensely fat and equally coarse, while her companion in arms had taken the other extreme; thin shrunken and to my impression, in bad health. They were evidently vain of each other... Poor Sir William! Wretched but not abashed, he followed at a short distance.

Kiln Park Lime kilns designed by John Nash [also designed Brighton Pavilion and Regent St.]

1810. Quay gate removed. It had stood on the southern side of the harbour by the sluice wall and led into a steep narrow road winding between two walls and through a passage. A new road was built from the harbour, on arches.

1812. Charles Norris published his etchings of Tenby's antiquities.

1831. The National School was begun on Castle Hill - now the museum.

1839. The infant School was begun.

1840. Start of Tenby police force.

1840. Trinity Board set up their life saver on Woolhouse Rocks.

1844. The wreck of the brig Richard.

1852 first lifeboat house in Tenby

Built by the the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners Benevolent Society. It is located at the top of the harbour sands, tucked between the harbour wall and the house 'Upper Deck'. It was taken over by the RNLI in 1854, and continued in use until 1862 when a new larger station was built at the top of Castle Sands In 1888 the RNLI handed it over to the Admiralty for coastguard use. The lifeboat house was a simple shed structure, its two side walls formed by the Harbour wall to the west and the western elevation of Upper Deck to the east. The front elevation is of well coursed stone, with a large arched entrance with brick headers and a stone keystone. In front of the building is a well laid stone slipway, with a stone step up to the original floor level of the lifeboat house. The floor has been relaid (and heightened) with concrete in recent years, and a new mezzanine floor laid onto the western half of the original tie-beams. The roof structure is a lean-to one, higher against the harbour wall and sloping down to the east.

It housed a 10 oar rowing boat, some 28ft in length, and its distance from the sea, particularly at low tide, necessitated the use of horses and people to pull the lifeboat on wheeled carriages down to the water. Called Florence, a great awkward looking craft painted light blue, curved and rising to a peak each end. The crew wore jackets of parallel strips of Cork bound together.

1858. The Tenby Grammar School was founded.

1863. Pembroke Tenby railway line was opened.

1869. St Catherine's Fort was completed. The island had a Chapel on it in ancient times and 1864 a fort was started upon it as part of the defences of Milford Haven and the Dockyard of Pembroke Dock.

1871. Tenby Cottage Hospital was built, had water beds and an ambulance litter.

1876. The crèche and day nursery was opened. To enable mothers to follow their outdoor calling with the knowledge that their children will be duly taken care of, and also allow of the elder children attending school, in lieu of nursing the younger.

Rules of the crèche:

1 No children admitted above 5 years of age, children above three required to bring their school pence with them.

2 Two pence to be charged for each Child, each day, including food.

3 The hours of admission are from eight in the morning to eight in the evening. Children are expected to be in time for nursery breakfast at 8.30 and must be punctually removed when the nursery closes.

4 No Child with an infectious disorder admitted under any circumstances.

5 Children must be brought quite clean.

From Princes, pigs and people of Tenby by Wendy Osborne.

1877. Tenby and County Club Croft Terrace opened.

1878. A new St Julian's Chapel was built from voluntary contributions with a memorial window to three Tenby fishermen, John Lillycrop, his son John and John Child, drowned off Caldey on Ash Wednesday.

1878. Tenby Fire brigade was presented with a Fire Engine by the Sun Fire Office and a fire escape by the society for the Protection of Life from Fire.

1897. Royal Victoria Pier and Landing stage was opened.

1915. The town walls were classed as ancient monuments by His Majesty's Office of Works.

1938. The Old Merchants House in Bridge Street taken over by the National Trust to be preserved as an ancient building. Tudor Merchants last survivor of the many fine Tudor mansions that formerly adorned Tenby. Dates chiefly from the 15c or early 16c and originally formed part of a much larger building including the houses on either side, approached by what are now blocked doorways. Built of stone with round Flemish chimney, contains some original fireplaces and windows. On the one remaining original partition on the ground floor under 23 Coats of whitewash was discovered some painted decoration on the plaster in red, black and White.

1974. March 19th the last council meeting of Tenby borough Council under the provisions of a Local Government Act (1972); which ended the corporate existence of the town. Councillor Mrs Iris Davies was the 584th and last mayor of the borough.

1857 Manners And Customs Of The People Of Tenby

In The Eighteenth Century. Cambrian Journal 1857

THE history of a little town is not without interest, nor are the labours and researches of those who prepare it to be deemed useless or unimportant; for the mind loves to dwell with Hallowed pleasure on the records of the dead, and to treasure up the remembrance of the past.

The history of Tenby has not been neglected. Fenton in his Pembrokeshire, and Norris in his Etchings, have done tolerable justice to its historical antiquities ; so that, without having recourse to rare manuscripts, difficult of access, little worthy of notice can be added. But though the interest excited by these historical revelations of antiquity may be greater and more permanent, a review of some of the habits and customs, the superstitions and foibles, of the former occupants of our town, cannot fail to prove an interesting study. Nor will the subject be entirely devoid of utility, if we but place the customs and habits of those who went " the way to dusty death," even so recently as at the beginning of the same century, side by side with those of the present inhabitants, and then observe in what we have improved, and in what fallen short. Perhaps we shall not, on the whole, be inclined to regret that we were not born in " the good old times."

The old year the year of our British and Anglo-Saxon forefathers began with Christmas, which was in past times, as it is still, the season above all others of popular customs and observances. With that merry season, therefore, we may conveniently begin our calendar of the customs of Tenby.

On Christmas-eve large crowds assembled, parading through the different Streets of the town in procession, carrying lighted torches, which flared about in a manner that threatened at times a general conflagration of the whole town, a fire-engine being then, as now, unknown in Tenby. Cow-horns blown by many in the crowds, perfectly ad libitum, usurped the place of better music, and " racked the listening ears." Verses were shouted by stentorian lungs, containing the valuable information that "Christmas comes but once a year," while the joyous pealing of the Christmas chimes had a most cheerful and exhilarating effect. The insides of the windows of private houses were decorated with a variety of quaint devices, formed of the leaves of evergreens, principally box, myrtle, or holly, the red berries of the latter making a pleasing contrast ; and few places of business were to be seen without these Christmas symbols.

[As a boy we used to say:-

Christmas is coming

The geese is getting fat

Please put a penny in a poor mans hat

If you Haven't a penny a happennny will do

If to Haven't a happenny

God Bless You]

At 4 A.M. on Christmas-day it was customary for the young men of the town to escort the rector, with lighted torches, from his residence to Church ; extinguishing their torches in the porch, they went in to the early service, and at its conclusion the torches were relighted, and the procession returned to the Rectory, the chimes ringing till the time of the usual morning service. Then it was that the good folks met their friends and neighbours with a hearty grip of the hand arid, a beaming face, and each wished the other a "merry Christmas;" and, like the " fine old English gentleman," " while feast ing all the great," they " ne'er forgot the small," for the aged poor, going from door to door on their eleemosynary (giving of alms) errand, were rarely sent empty away.

Sometimes before, and sometimes after, Christmas-day, the fishermen dressed up one of their number, whom they called the " Lord Mayor of Penniless Cove," with a covering of evergreens, and a mask over his face ; they would then carry him about, seated on a chair, with flags flying, and a couple of violins playing before him. Before every house the " Lord Mayor " would address the occupants, wishing them a " Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year." If his good wishes were responded to with money, his followers gave three cheers, the masquer would himself return thanks, and the crowd again give " three times three," hip, hip, hurrah !

If, however, the eve of Christmas was a season of mirth and good fellowship, the day after (St. Stephen's-day) was stained with the recurrence, from year to year, of the barbarous and uncouth practice of "holly beating," which consisted in a furious onslaught being made by men and boys, armed with large Bushes of the prickly holly, on the naked and unprotected arms of female domestics, and others of a like class; and as the short-sleeved jackets of the Welsh servants pointed them out as convenient subjects for the flagellation, their bleeding arms soon bore testimony to the unrelenting barbarity of their unmanly tormentors. It is not very clear what object the people of Tenby could have had in view by such a performance certainly it was no appropriate offering to the memory of the gentle Stephen; however, we will leave the usage and its commemoration to the past, and congratulate ourselves that the terrors of the law have extinguished this ill-mannered custom of the good old times. Leaving the former occupants of the town to the enjoyment of their roast beef and plum -pudding, we will pass on to New Year's day.

[My memories of the early 1950's to 1990's -- always just after midnight the house had to be "first footed" by a dark haired man

Who would say

A Happy New Year

A Happy New Year

A pocket full of money

and a cellar full of beer and a big fat pig to last you all the year

He would come in the front door and open the back to let the back luck of the previous year fly out

He carried a silver coin and a piece of coal and was given a glass of home made wine]

In the first place, then, there was a general desire to see the old year out and the new year in, which was done according to the several tastes of different parties. Some danced the old year out, some sung it out, some drank it out, for the love of " Auld Lang Syne," some few prayed it out, but very many walked it out, which was done to the intense annoyance of invalids, and of good musicians. For the promenaders, judging that music should herald in the new year, sung away in total defiance of all rules of melody and harmony, perfectly regardless of their distracted auditors, such verses as the following :

" Get up on New Year's morning,

The cocks are all a-crowing ;

And if you think you're awake too soon,

Why get up and look at the stars and moon ;

But get up on New Year's morning."

These lines also are sung in some rural parishes near

Tenby :

" The roads are very dirty,

My shoes are very thin,

I wish you a happy New Year,

And please to let me in."

It is easy to see that the object nearest the singers hearts was, that all who were asleep should " awake from their slumbers." But there was another reason for the early relinquishment of the downy pillow, as urged by the discordant but importunate singers. To rise early on New Year's morning was generally considered " lucky," on the principle that, as the year was begun, so it would be continued day by day till the next New Year's morn ; for this reason, also, the good and thrifty housewife managed that a fresh loaf should be brought into the house on that morning, while a perfect and rigid quarantine existed with regard to female visitors, till the threshold had been crossed by one of the masculine gender ; and numberless were the instances always at hand illustrative of the evil to be avoided, and luck gained, by the continuance of so ridiculous and, as far as the Fair sex were concerned, so unflattering a custom. Even now many people object to the entrance of a female before the incoming of one of the other sex.

From an early hour of the morning a continued assault was made on the knockers by boys and girls with their " New Year's water." Their equipment consisted of a tin, or earthenware cup, filled with spring water, drawn fresh from the well that morning, and a bunch or sprig of box, myrtle, or other evergreen immersed, with which they would sprinkle the hands and faces of those they met, receiving in return a trifling gratuity. When one of these youngsters was admitted into a house, every room from kitchen to attic was sprinkled by him, as well as the inmates themselves. The fee for this performance ranged, according to the liberality of the donor, from copper to silver coins. Among the numerous snatches of songs sung during the ceremony, we subjoin the following, which we quote from the Archeologia Cambrensis, 1849, p. 141, the verse having been taken down by the Rev. J. B. Smith, late curate of Tenby, from the lips of the children themselves :

" Here we bring new water from the well so clear,
For to worship God with, this happy new year
Sing levy dew, sing levy dew, the water and the wine,
With seven bright gold wires, and bugles that do shine ;
Sing reign of lair maid, with gold upon her toe,
Open you the west door, and turn the old year go
Sing reign of Fair maid, with gold upon her chin, Open you the east door, and let the new year in."

But of all the holiday seasons kept by the inhabitants of Tenby, the most interesting was the " Maying time ;" for in the thorough innocence and beautiful simplicity of its amusements, which were joined in by all ages and sexes, there was everything to admire, and nothing to regret. On May-eve the inhabitants would turn out in troops, bearing in their hands boughs of thorn in full blossom, which were bedecked with other flowers, and then stuck outside the windows of the houses. May-poles were reared up in different parts of the town, decorated with flowers, coloured papers, and bunches of variegated ribbon.

On May-day the young men and maidens would, joining hand in hand, dance round the May-poles, and "thread the needle," as it was termed. A group of from fifty to 100 persons would wend their way from one pole to another, till they had thus traversed the town. Meeting on their way other groups, who were coming from an opposite direction, both parties would form a "lady's chain," and so pass on their respective ways. The Maypoles belonged to the children of the several localities in which they were erected, and it was the custom for the possessors of a pole to endeavour to pull down those set up in other places. A watch was therefore left round each, and frequently the parents would mount guard to repel the daring invaders. If, however, a surprise was effected, and the assault proved successful, both parties joined in the joke, and everything proceeded amicably. A superstitious notion prevailed that it was fatal for any person to pick up a piece of hawthorn in flower, if found broken off on the road.

Whit-Monday succeeded, when a women's benefit club walked in procession to Church, with band and banners before them, and bunches of flowers in their hands. After the service they dined, and wound up the evening by dancing "Sir Roger de Coverley," "John Saunders," and executing various other Terpsichorean feats. Large parties were in the habit of visiting Caldy Island, there to pass away their time with rabbit and puffin shooting, and picnics on the beach. As the entertainments were not governed by the Laws of temperance, the boatmen were not always in a fit condition to take charge of those who had committed themselves to their care. Hairbreadth escapes from a watery grave were very frequently experienced.

A passing notice of the roystering Hay-making customs must not be omitted. If any one was so unfortunate as to enter a field at Hay-making time, he or she was immediately pounced upon by the Hay-makers of the opposite sex, tossed about on the Hay-cocks, and bound with Hay bands, till a species of "black mail" had been Levied. However inclined to resist, the victim, laid on his back in the broiling sun, was soon obliged to sue for quarter.

The ceremony when performed on females, was termed " giving them a Green gown," and when on one of the other sex, " stretching their backs." Neither age or condition was respected, and a Hay-field was therefore carefully avoided.

We must not neglect to make mention of St. Crispin's day, the 25th of October. An effigy was made up, and hung on some elevated and prominent place (the steeple for instance) on the previous night. On the morning of the saint's day it was cut down, and carried about the town, a will being read in doggerel verse, purporting to be the last testament of the saint, in pursuance of which the several articles of dress were distributed to the different shoemakers ; at length nothing remained of the image but the padding, which was kicked about by the crowd as a sort of revenge for the treatment given to St. Crispin, his followers hung up the effigy of a carpenter on St. Clement's-day, 9 the 23rd of November.

We now approach the season of the year when the darker superstitions of our forefathers come into play. Witchcraft, spell-working, and other superstitions were extremely popular in years gone by, and many strange tales are narrated how such-and-such persons were bewitched how such-and-such witches were caught, by making them sit on a chair, and then sticking them through the chair with a two-pronged fork how others saw the spirits of their intended consorts. Nor are there tales wanting of some who had made compacts with the evil one, and how the latter, at the expiration of the contract, came and took away the victim, leaving behind a sulphureous smell. Stories are also told of coffins having been opened, and nothing but stones found in them, Satan having carried off the body, the existence of resurrectionists never once entering into the calculation of the narrators. As it would exceed our limits to give place to all the well attested ghost stories, we will be content to draw the reader's attention to a few of the charms, or spells, employed by love-sick maidens for the purpose of seeing into futurity, and more especially to be favoured with a glimpse of their Husbands. For the proper working of these spells, or charms, there were various things indispensable, the absence of any of which was fatal to their successful termination. The favourite time of the year for these performances was " All Hallows'-eve," when it was customary for females to go alone to cross-roads at midnight, and, having raised a little of the ground, to sow some hemp seed, chanting the while,

" Hemp seed I sow,
Hemp seed I'll mow ;

Whoe'er my true love is to be,
Come rake this hemp seed after me."

It has been affirmed that the shape of the person sought came and raked the hemp seed, while some sowers have been frightened by actually feeling the rake touch their legs.

Another means employed to bring about the same result was to place a table in the kitchen, or Hall to set thereon meat and drink, together with a lighted candle, then putting a wet article of female wearing apparel on a chair before the fire, the expecting Fair one would hide in a closet, or cupboard, and patiently wait to see whether any person would come and turn the article. If the person appeared, the same year was to see her a bride ; some, we have been informed, have been much terrified by seeing the apparition of a coffin.

A third recipe was as follows : bore nine holes in the blade bone of a shoulder of Mutton; put it under the pillow to dream on ; also place your shoes at the foot of the bed, in the shape of a T, saying these words :

" I put my shoes in the shape of a T,
Hoping my true love for to see,
Not in apparel or array,
But in his clothes he wears every day."

This was pronounced to be remarkably efficacious.

[It is a curious circumstance that we are informed by Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. i. 11) that the practice of divination by the blade of a shoulder of Mutton was introduced into Pembrokeshire by the Flemings, who were brought there under the Anglo-Normans ; and he gives us some curious instances of the purposes to which it was applied. T. W]

We must not omit to notice the way to get a person cured who had been bewitched, the more so as, since the commencement of this year (1857), several cases of supposed witchcraft have been brought before the public in the newspapers, and the recipe for the cure in 1857 is almost a transcript of that of 1757. The finger nails of the bewitched are to be pared close, the parings thrown into the fire, while a near relation of the afflicted stands at an open window. The witch is then seen approaching, writhing in great agony, and when she sees the look-out she will say, " How is so-and-so ? " The answer is, " Very bad to-day." The witch then rejoins, " Poor thing, God bless her then," and immediately the afflicted person regains her strength.

The belief in " corpse lights," or " corpse candles," and " spectral funerals," was formerly prevalent, and is still partially so. The appearance of the former is supposed to betoken the death of some member of the family round whose dwelling-place the light is seen first to hover, and then take the road to the Church-yard. It is also seen, some time beforehand, flickering over the place where a fatal accident is about to happen. The appearance of the spectral light is most capricious, comes at no certain time, and is not seen by everybody. The latter (the spectral funeral) bears the shadowy likeness of the persons who will form the funeral procession, and the accompaniments of the rites of sepulture are also visible.

Stories are told of persons returning home at midnight who have become entangled in the phantom procession, and have failed to release themselves, until they had become aware, either by seeing the name on the coffinplate, or learning from one of the assemblage, whose death was thus foreshown.

But before closing our remarks on the superstitious observances celebrated by the old inhabitants of Tenby, let us say a passing word on the funerals. These were seldom select. All who desired to testify respect or regret for the departed, as well as the surviving relatives, were expected to attend, due publicity having been given.

At the appointed hour multitudes met at the house where the corpse lay, and where sometimes a short religious service was performed. They then slowly accompanied, promiscuously, the mortal remains to their resting-place, chanting, on the way, verses of psalms or hymns, expressive of sentiments apt to the occasion, to well known and mournful music, a small knot of singers, who acted as a leading choir, generally heading the procession. The custom of sending out to the waiting crowds " mulled beer" in Tankards, which were passed from hand to hand, and mouth to mouth, each taking a passing toll, contrasted rudely with the general solemnity of the arrangements.

Before concluding this brief notice of the customs and holiday usages of the former inhabitants of Tenby, we must own our inferiority to them in one essential, namely, the religious feelings and habits of the fishermen. Although we may, in the nineteenth century, pride ourselves on superior knowledge, and other advantages possessed by us, though we may congratulate ourselves on being less barbarous and superstitious, yet, in some cases, we also may learn a lesson from our predecessors, and, while avoiding their errors, still follow them with advantage in whatever is good. The following may be quoted without much injury to the moral or religious character of those concerned:

" Situated on the end of the old pier head once stood St. Julian's Chapel. In this edifice service was regularly performed : previous to their setting out, prayers were offered up before the assembled fishermen, for safety to themselves, and success to their undertakings : one half- penny was paid the officiating minister, as an acknowledgment for each man, and one penny for each boat ; and, as there could be no mistaking the zeal of those frequenting the service, we may not disbelieve the traditions of those old times, that the draughts of fish taken were all but miraculous. The fishermen did not consider their duty performed till they had offered up thanksgivings in the unostentatious Chapel for their safe return and preservation from an element in whose every wave death lay in ambush

The Chapel was converted into a bath, then into a blacksmith's storehouse, and finally torn down with the old pier head ; a new pier head has been erected, but we fear the fishermen of the present day do not see the necessity for another St. Julian's Chapel.

Petition

Humbly sheweth unto your lordship that we have lived in a very unhappy state in regard to our religious worship since our present rector has come here, whose vociferous method of preaching is truly disagreeable to us And though we have made frequent applications to him to preach by notes as his worthy predecessor always did, and all other Clergymen of the Church of England still do, yet he obstinately persists in following his methodistical custom of preaching extempore, and that so harsh and unintelligible to all capacities as he has prevented many well disposed Christians from frequenting the Church This obstinate behaviour of our rector being truly grievous to your petitioners, they, by their ChurchWarden presented him in your lordship's court at Haverfordwest at your Lordship's last visitation, and also at two subsequent courts In order to prevent your petitioners from having justice done then our rector has for these two years last past elected one Thomas Howells a man of a despicable character to be his ChurchWarden who acts agreeable to the rectors desire and has in his presentment contradicted your petitioners ChurchWarden's presentment As your petitioners have hitherto had no redress, we humbly apprehend we have no other method of being relieved but by applying to your lordship by petition

Your petitioners humble hope that your lordship will take their unhappy case into consideration unhappy, we may truly say, as we cannot go to our own Church with any comfort to hear his thundering incoherent doctrine, and grant us such relief as to your lordship shall see fit There were about 70 signatories

“Dreadful accident and loss of lives at Pembroke Dock Pembroke 23 July 1866

The town of Pembroke was, on Monday evening last, the scene of one of the most alarming accidents which have occurred here for many years past From the particulars which have been ascertained it appears that about six o'clock in the evening a party consisting of women and lads and children about 14 in number, were returning from a Hay-field in Lamphey Lane in a waggonette drawn by one horse The horse and vehicle were the property of Mrs Truscott of the White Hart Inn and when they had arrived nearly opposite the Dragon Hotel the belly band gave way and the horse began to kick. This so alarmed the women and children that they began to scream and by this means so frightened the animal that it took off at a furious pace down towards the Lion Hotel and from there up by the Old Castle Here PC Davies No 24 attempted to stop the animal but was unable to do so and also got much hurt in the attempt, the shaft having struck him in the side From thence the animal continued its career over the steep and sinuous Westgate Hill and eventually struck the vehicle against the old parapet wall of the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel when both horse and vehicle got turned completely over

In this terrible crash a young woman about 17 years of age named Dorcas Ann Truscott, a daughter of Mr W H Truscott of the "Red White and Blue" Inn Quay Pembroke was killed on the spot, while her younger sister, named Olwin Lavinia, age 14 years received a frightful scalp wound, sustained such other serious injuries that she is not expected to survive Ann Moy, a widow, about 60 years of age - so dread fully injured that her death is momentarily expected A lad named John Haran who was driving the horse at the time and his sister - both seriously injured A woman named Elizabeth Williams - much injured Lettice James, a woman who jumped out before the vehicle was turned over, very seriously injured The whole of the other occupants including an infant in arms, are more or less injured Dr H P Jones and Dr Reid were at once in attendance and rendered all the medical assistance they could Extract from the Haverfordwest and Milford Telegraph newspaper July 25th 1866”

Treffgarne [Roman activity ?]

Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

Treffgarne is a small village in Pembrokeshire, south-west Wales.

It lies to the south of the Preseli Hills. The village name is derived from 'tref' meaning town and 'garne' meaning rock, or the 'town of the rock'. The rock in this case is the locally infamous Treffgarne Rocks, a series of ancient Ordovician rhyolite volcanic plugs, now exposed, that form the Roche Rhyolite group.

[Minerals] --- including Gold –Roman mining??

A number of interesting minerals have been recorded including Brookite crystals (Titanium dioxide) and possibly tin. Small regular cavities can be found in the rocks where crystals of at least 1 cm width once resided. Gold has also been found at the rocks from drillcores and placer gold in the local Eastern Cleddau below the village. There is also an old legend of old gold workings near Treffgarne (possibly towards the farm Mount Pleasant) from the Roman period. Roman activity is certainly attested in the region with at least two Romano-British settlements nearby at Ambleston (Castle Fleming) and Wolfscastle and a possible extension of the Roman road from Carmarthen into Pembrokeshire.

The site of the village itself goes back to at least the medieval period. Evidence for this is in the form of a nearby medieval strip lynchet field system to the north of the village and a suggestion that the current Church sits on the site of a medieval Monastery.

Until the 1970s the village was quite small with no more than 120 inhabitants but has since grown with the development of a modern estate to the west of the Church. Close to the village to the west is Treffgarne Hall erected in 1842 by Dr. Evans. It was converted into a restaurant in 1979 by executive chef, Derek Stenson and his partner John Neville, former sous chef at the Dorchester Hotel, but this endeavour did not last.

Close to the village to the north east is the disused Treffgarne Quarry which provided roadstone.

The village is not very significant, with a rambling collection of houses and bungalows in the vicinity of a little bellcote Church. Treffgarne Gorge is far more interesting; a natural route way followed by road rail and river. This deep cleft through the upland ridge of mid Pembrokeshire was once a haunt of robbers (and wolves), and it has always been well wooded. There are large stone quarries here, now abandoned. Above the gorge are the sentinel rocks of Maiden Castle and Lion Roch among the oldest rocks in Pembrokeshire and reminiscent of the Dartmoor tors. At the northern end of the gorge is the tourist centre of Nant y Coy mill.

Iron Age fort.

It is on the Lansker dividing line, and the Brunel railway line that was never finished was supposed to go through the Gorge.

1811 Trefgarn –Fenton Tour

Hence I proceeded towards Trefgarn, or the town of the Rock, still keeping the Fishguard road that takes its course for above a mile through a long reach of wood overhanging the Cleddau, here straitened by the opposite hills of the two Trefgarns. Little Trefgarn, a single mansion house on the top of the Hill, the east side of the Valle, is held under lease from the precentor of St David's by John Edwards, esq.. Whose ancestor, when he filled that stall in the cathedral, having made it his residence, his descendants for near two centuries continue to inhabit it, and, in my remembrance, in great style of great hospitality, till the present possessor leaving it for Sealyham, the seat of his lady in the neighbourhood, it has dwindled into a farm-house.

This place, at the founding of the precentor's stall by Gervase or Jorwerth, was annexed to that dignitary; but as its forest abounded with game, Bishop Gower, the luxury of whose table may be presumed to have kept pace with the other part of his magnificent establishment, since the raising of that noble structure, his palace of St David's resumes it for the use of the episcopal table, giving the precentor in lieu of it twenty marks, and assining his reasons for the resumption.

The other , called Great Trefgarn, lies at the back of the wood; The west side of the river is a small village containing a few houses and the Church, which is a rectory of small value, the advowson, together with the fee simple of the whole parish, and manor coextensive, belonging to a Mr Evans who lately purchased it..

In this little parish, on a high ridge of waste ground, the continuation of Plumstone mountain terminating here, stand those very curious detached rocks called Trefgarn Rocks, having the appearance of ruined towers, which are seen from a great distance, and form the most remarkable features in that part of the country.

At the exit of the new road where the river presses on it, pass was obliged to be cut through a projection of the rocky precipice overhanging it which produces a most picturesque appearance. The rock to the land-side , that rises alost perpendicularly from the road to a great height, is finely broken, covered with tangled shrubs, lichens and mosses of various sorts and colours, and has its summit crowned by an ancient British encampment.

When the ingenious mineralogist Rasp was in this country making observations and collections for a most interesting work he than had in contemplation, nay, had begun, a mineralogical chart of Wales, he showed me some fine specimens of porphyry and Jasper he had discovered in these rocks, and said they involved very valuable and extensive strata of them

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales – Trevgarn, Great - Lewis

Trevgarn, great, a parish, in the poor law union of Haverfordwest, hundred of rhôs, county of pembroke, south wales, 5 miles (n.) from Haverfordwest; containing 100 inhabitants. The parish is bounded on the east by Spittal and part of St. Dogmael's, south and west by Camrhos, and north by Hayscastle; and is intersected by a stream called the Nant-y-Coy, and from north to south by the western Cleddy river, up the valley of which, and through the village, passes the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Fishguard. It is computed to contain 1200 acres, including that part of it termed Little Trevgarn, lying east of the Cleddy; 700 acres are arable, 400 pasture, and 100 woodland, chiefly oak. The surface is generally hilly, with a southern inclination, so as to command extensive views over the south-western part of Pembrokeshire, embracing St. St Bride's Bay and Milford Haven. Of the cultivated portion, consisting of a very good soil, the principal produce is oats, barley, and wheat; but the north-western part is composed chiefly of the Trevgarn and Leweston mountains, which form an elevated, heath, and barren tract, unfit for tillage. Trevgarn Hall situated a little to the west of the village, was erected in 1824 by the late proprietor, Dr. Evans, and commands a fine view over the district of Rhôs.

The most remarkable natural feature of the surface, is that which gave name to the parish, Trevgarn signifying "the town of the rock." It consists of three separate piles of rocks, of striking aspect, rising perpendicularly and abruptly to a considerable height from the ridge of the Moor, and presenting the appearance of ruined castles, an idea that seems confirmed to the eye by their being situated so as to command the narrow pass of the mountain through which the western Cleddy here flows, and which, on the opposite eastern side, exhibits a fine grove, feathering down to the water's edge. They are of the transition formation, containing, it is said, valuable veins, and situated about 500 yards from each other, the whole chain running west and east, and continued on the eastern side of the river Cleddy, in Little Trevgarn. The western or most elevated, called "Polegarn," appears, when viewed from the south-east, like a huge dismantled tower, and is visible from distant parts of the county: on a nearer approach, it is found to consist of disrupted masses, covered with lichens of varied and vivid colours. The second pile, termed "Picketgarn," exhibits the most irregular and grotesque forms, displaying from the south the aspect of a vast dilapidated Castle, while from the east it presents among its outlines the figures of two lions couchant. On the northern side of this stupendous group, and detached from the great mass, is a very large equilateral and triangular stone, twenty-one feet long and five deep, supported by a few points of its base on a cubical block about seven feet six inches square, the whole suggesting some artificial means for its erection. The third group rises in fearful grandeur from the brink of the Cleddy, and is intersected by the new Fishguard road, offering to artists from its colour, form, and composition, studies for striking and effective display. It has been surrounded by a ditch and rampart, part of which is still remaining: doubts are entertained whether these are of Roman or British structure.

The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £1. 13. 9., present net income, £60, with a glebe-house adjacent to the Church, of ample and convenient form, built in 1832 by the incumbent; patron, John Evans, esq., who is Lord of the manor, and proprietor of the whole parish. The Church, a plain but neat edifice, measures, with the chancel, about sixty feet in length, and eighteen in breadth; all the sittings are free. The old road to Fishguard passed over the Hill, through the village of Trevgarn, where a tradition still prevails that it was once the seat of Cambrian royalty; which receives some countenance from the circumstance, that in 1798, on pulling down some buildings used as a barn and out-offices, the massive walls were found to be built upon circular arches almost buried in the earth, and these arches supported on some rude stone columns: on digging up the floor of the subterraneous pile, a quantity of coins and silver and gold trinkets were discovered and secreted by the persons employed. Some old encampments were formerly traceable in different parts, but their defences have been levelled.

The Welsh hero Owain Glyndwr was born here.

1895 Nooks and Corners - Timmins

At the adjacent village of Trefgarn, that great Welsh patriot and freelance, the famous Owen Glyndwr, is said to have first seen the light ; an event that took place about the middle of the fourteenth century. Certain strange phenomena that were observed at the time of his birth, were turned to full account by this enterprising adventurer ; hence Shakespeare, in his play of Henry IV., puts into the mouth of Glyndwr the proud words :

'At my birth
The front of heav'n was full of fiery shapes ;
The goats ran from the mountains, and the herds
Were strangely clamorous in the frightened fields :
These signs have marked me extraordinary,
And all the courses of my life do show
I am not in the roll of common men.'

1847 The State of Education in Wales - Parish of Treffgarn

On the 4th of January I visited the above parish. The Rector informed me that there had been no school of any description in the parish for the last twelve years. There had been one until within the last twelve months a charity school in the adjoining parish of Spittal (supported by the Rector of Treffgarn, who is also Incumbent of Spittal, and the gentlemen residing in the two parishes) to which the children from Spittal were in the habit of going. It was discontinued in consequence of a promise made by the trustees of the late Mrs Bevan to send one of their Masters into the parish of Spittal, which would be for the benefit of the children of both Treffgarn and Spittal. He did not consider the labourers in Treffgarn in any way poor. There was scarcely a man in the parish who did not keep a cow, and they were all in full employ. Wages were 1s per day on their own finding, or 8d per day with food. They were all remarkably sober and industrious. He did not know an instance of drunkenness in the parish. Nevertheless great difficulty was experienced in inducing parents to send their children to school. David Lewis Assistant.

Sites of Interest

Treffgarne Bridge Quarry

A Site of Special Scientific Interest in Pembrokeshire, South Wales. It has been designated as a Site of Special Scientific Interest since January 1954 in an attempt to protect its fragile geological elements. The site has an area of 0.4 hectares and is managed by Natural Resources Wales. The name derives from the Welsh "Trefgarn". This site is designated due to its geological qualities: Cambrian sedimentary rocks exposed in a disused quarry and road cutting. The sedimentary rocks have yielded a variety of fossils that indicate that the rocks were formed around 490 million years ago and therefore provide a means of correlation with other key sites such as those in North Wales and Shropshire.

Treffgarne Lake

Treffgarne Lake is on the site of the former Treffgarne Quarry that was once part of the Treffgarne Estate. The quarry was used as a source of andesite, which is used for road construction, up until the 1960s. In the 1970s the quarry the sold to Sealyham Activity Centre and it has been subsequently used for canoeing. It was photographed during aerial reconnaissance by RCAHMW on 15 June 2004. Claire Parry, RCAHMW, 10 February 2011.

Treffgarne Hall

A privately owned Grade II listed Georgian country house, located to the west of the village of Treffgarne, west Wales. Set on a S-shaped hillside to provide panoramic views South west over Pembrokeshire, the building was erected in 1824 for Dr. Evans. Built out of stone with two storeys, the two hipped end panels frame a flat central-door entrance on the three-panel house. The main door opens to an axial passage which passes numerous living room doors to the large rear kitchen, also enabling access to both main and servants staircases. In 1905 the estate was bought by Victor James Higgon, who's wife Catherine Octavia Edwards was the last of the Tucker family to live at Sealyham House. Land owned previously by Evans family, and an earlier house may be incorporated in the rear wing. David Evans (d 1841), his widow Bridget of Ciliauwen, Llanstinan, (d 1857), daughter Elizabeth (d1865) and third son, David, of Ciliauwen (d 1878) and Evan Higgon of Ciliauwen (d 1855) all buried in Evans of Ciliauwen burial enclosure at Treffgarne Church. Memorials also to John Evans died in 1893. and his wife Eliza in 1894. Victor Higgon (owner of Sealyham in 1920), High Sheriff in 1931.

Trefgarn Hall::

Trefgarn Hall is an eighteenth or nineteenth century stone building, with an L-shaped plan, of two and three storeys, under a slate roof. There is a Long painted staircase window, inscribed 'Erected by D Evans 1824'. The interior includes a marble fireplace and wrought iron stair balustrade. RCAHMW, 01 January 1993.

Lodge, Trefgarn; Treffgarne

It was built of rubble with a slate roof in the 1830's as a lodge to Treffgarne Hall. Single storeyed plus attic with a distinctive 3-bay front which has tall pointed arch recesses containing Tudor-like flat pointed headed windows all with voussoirs.

The surface of this parish is considerably diversified and highly picturesque efforts are produced by the outcrops of rock, which from a distance take the form of castellated crags. Small earthworks abound, but they are of a minor character, and appear to have been agricultural enclosures, rather than military camps.

Great Treffgarne Rocks

Great Treffgarne Rocks is an oval enclosure, measuring c.80m by 50m, and defined by double banks and ditches to the west and south, scarping to the south-east and precipitous crags above the western Cleddau to the north and east. There is an entrance in the south facade and reports of 'crude walling' to the south-east.

Treffgarne Gorge Defended Enclosure

Treffgarne Gorge Defended Enclosure comprises a small enclosure, under coniferous forest, on the east side of the gorge. It has a bank and ditch encircling an area about 25 meters in diameter, with a surviving curved bank entrance. The external ditch is about 4 meters wide and at its deepest about 3 meters deep. This site has at least seven others of its kind surviving within a mile and a half stretch of the steep-sided Treffgarne Gorge. Source: Cadw scheduling description. Nant-Y-Coy Mill, Treffgarne Gorge

The mill reputedly dates from 1332, but the present mill dates from 1844, as evidenced by a plaque with the date and the initials J E. The mill forms an L-plan with the mill house, both being built from rubblestone under slate roofs. Attached to the north end of the mill is a lower building with arched brick doveholes with slate shelves.

The mill was part of a working farm until 1971, and is now a tourist mill with a restored, 13ft 6in diameter overshot waterwheel on its west wall. B.A.Malaws, 11 February 2003

Near a modern house of that name, close to Penally, are the sparse fragments of a 15c house garrisoned for the King on the outbreak of the civil war. It was taken by assault in 1644 by Major General Laugharne and destroyed, a large number of weapons, cattle and horses were captured. _

Upton Castle

A small Castle was built upon the site indicated in the closing years of the 13th century, probably by the third member of the Maliphaunt family who settled at Upton. (Walter Malefaunt, the third successive bearer of the name, appears as a witness to a grant of Aymerde Valence to the Hospitallers of Slebech in 1323.) . In plan it appears to have been similar to Picton Castle, and may have been built by the same craftsmen.

A sketch by Norris made about the year 1800, shows its appearance at that time, since which extensive alterations have still further removed its earlier features, and there remains little beyond the gateway with its two flanking circular towers

The Castle was modernized in the 18th century and today is on private grounds not open to the public, however the Castle grounds contain a fine arboretum managed by the National Park Authority.

a parish, in the hundred of Castlemartin, union and county of Pembroke, South Wales, 3½ miles (N. E.) from Pembroke; containing 12 inhabitants. This parish, which was withdrawn, a few years since, from the hundred of Narberth, and included in that of Castlemartin, is exceedingly small, and inhabited only by one gentleman's family, who are proprietors of the whole. It occupies an elevated site above a creek of Milford Haven, and was formerly distinguished for its Castle, which, if not originally built, was anciently occupied, by the family of Maliphant, from whom it passed by marriage to that of Bowen . Upton Castle and its dependencies were subsequently purchased by Mr. Tasker, who devised his estates among his three nieces, one of whom, by marriage, conveyed the Castle and a portion of this property to the Rev. William Evans, who is now owner of the parish. The remains of the old Castle, incorporated in the buildings of the present mansion, consist principally of the entrance gateway, and the two circular bastions by which it was defended; one of these now forming a projecting window in one of the apartments. The seat occupies a charming situation, and commands picturesque views of the surrounding country, and of the ruins of Carew Castle, washed at their base by the converging estuaries which unite to form this branch of the Haven. Upton is annexed to the rectory of Nash. The Church, a small edifice, is supposed to have been built at the same time as the Castle, to which it was formerly attached. It contains some ancient monuments, among which is one having a recumbent effigy of a warrior in complete armour, under a richly sculptured canopy of stone: a clenched hand, issuing from the wall, forms a candelabrum for a taper, for the maintenance of which some fund has been probably left by the deceased or his relatives. There are also several mural monuments to more recent proprietors of the estate.

Upton Chapel

dedicated to St Giles

RCAM

This small disused edifice stands closely adjacent to, but not adjoining, Upton Castle, though it is said that it formerly was part of the residence.

Interior Upton Chapel 1895 Timmins

The building on plan shows a chancel (16ft by 10 ft 6in) nave (27ft by 14 ft) with a single Bell cote above the west gable. In the south wall of the chancel is a single trifoliated lancet, now blocked, and a plain piscine. The chancel arch is a plain circular –headed cut (6ft wide) through the east wall of the nave. The entrance is in the south wall of the nave and has been modernised. The Jacobean pulpit is that formerly used in St Mary's Church Haverfordwest. The font basin is of the square Norman type (26in externally 18in internally 9in deep). It stands on a plain circular shaft and square base, the total height being 31 in. It is one of the most perfect examples of the type in the county (Arch Camb 1880 IV xi 295)

The roof and windows (with one exception) are modern.

Effigies – There are four sepulchral monuments.

Beneath the blocked lancet in the chancel is a 13th century mailed effigy which once stood on a altar tomb in the parish Church of Nash. The effigy is of a large man 6 ft even without the lower limbs is considered to be the most ancient of its kind in the country reputed to be a Lord of Upton Drowned in a shipwreck as he was returning home from a long voyage — used to be at Nash Church sometimes called the "Admiral".

Against the north wall of the nave and beneath an ogee canopy, is the effigy of a knight girt partly on mail and partly in plate armour. The figure is thought to be William Malefont who died in 1362 and is clad in a complete suit of Chain mail

The effigy of a female under an ogre arch in the north east corner of the Chancel. The corbel supporting the western pinnacle of the arch of canopy is adorned by a grotesque mask , rudely carved. This is suggested by Glynne to be the wife of William Malefant , from the clothing the figure would appear to be from about 1380 - 1420 Did this figure also come from Nash Church? All the above represent departed Maliphaunts of the 14th century

In the chancel is a much worn slab charged with a male full face above a long floriated cross. The head, which Sir Stephen Glynne, who saw it in August 1871, describes (Arch Camb 1888 V v 125) as that of a priest, does not seem from its present state to have been tonsured: the hair is curled over each ear, the head rests upon a rectangular cushion, and no priestly paraphernalia are to be traced. along the edge of the stone runs an inscription, practically obliterated except for the letters A C....LAM..IAR: PRE., which appear to be of the 13th century

On the walls there are mural tablets to members of the Bowen , Taskers and Evans families. Stone Taper Holder Affixed to the north wall of the nave – apparently its original position at a height of 4ft from the present floor level and projecting from the wall 5 ½ in, is a man's clenched fist with a perforation for placing in it a light of taper. (Arch Camb 1888 V v 127)

Cross On the south side of the churchyard stands a stone cross five ft six in high with octagonal shaft; the base has been restored.

Quoting Llwynwormwood Papers

In a case submitted on 23 October 1722, for counsel's opinion in regard to the liability of the owner of Upton for payment of tithes on the demense lands of Upton , it was stated that the benefice was a Chapel of ease belonging to Nash. The document adds that "there is a tradition that during the period of celibacy of Clergy, the rector [of Nash] always lived at Upton with the patron, and had his diet there, and that there were then four instances within memory where the rector while he was unmarried had his diet in the house whereof the then present incumbent was one"

This benefice is a Chapel subordinate to Nash Rectory, and from the earliest recorded institution the rector of Nash has also held Upton or Ucton.

George Owen in his list of benefices compiled in 1594, states that it was a rectory appendant to the manor of Upton, the patron then being Harry Bowen [of Upton].

Uzmaston.

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

A parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dungledy, and county of Pembroke, South Wales, 1½ mile (South. East.) from Haverfordwest; containing 627 inhabitants. This parish, commonly called "Ismiston," is situated on the western Cleddy river, and comprises a moderate extent of inclosed and cultivated land; the soil is generally fertile, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The western part, containing the straggling extremity of a suburb of Haverfordwest, termed Cartlet, is included within the limits of that borough. The parish rates are Levied by the ploughland, in the measurement of which ten feet and a half are allowed to each rod.

Uzmaston is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant; net income, £117; patrons and appropriators, the Dean and Chapter of St Davids, whose tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £205. The Church, dedicated to St. Ishmael, is not remarkable for any architectural details.

A day and Sunday school is held, in connexion with the Established Church.

Uzmaston St David (or St Ishmael)

Notes on the older churches in the four Welsh Dioceses Sir Stephen Glynne

1858 A small Church of curious irregular outline, and badly modernised. It has a nave and chancel, and `quasi` transepts on the north and south of dissimilar form and size, and a small tower at the north end of the transept. There is much of the rude local Pembrokeshire type. The chancel is small, and much blocked by seats but has curious features. In the North and South walls are flat rude arches, seen elsewhere in this diocese. The southern arch has in its jamb a large oblong recess; and within the arch a two light Perpendicular window of trefoiled lights is opened in the wall. Near the arch appears a rude corbel on the wall. The east window is small and perpendicular, of three lights. In the south wall is a small square recess. In the angle between the north transept and chancel is the shed like contrivance for a hagnoscope, once communicating with the arch in the north wall of the chancel. There is no arch from the nave to the transept. The south transept is modern in all probability, and has a gallery. The windows of the nave are all modern. The fond is an ancient one of local type; the bowl square and scalloped at the base upon a cylindrical stem, having round it a cable moulding, and set upon a square plinth. The tower which contains two bells has a saddle-back roof with scarcely any apertures, but a little slit near the gable. It has no buttress, and on the east side are a kind of horse block steps, on the outside. The porch is modern.

The building seen by Sir Stephen Glynne in 1858 was drastically modernised in 1870, when the Church was, in the main, rebuilt.

At the reopening the statement was made (Carmarthen Journal 28th November 1873) that all that had been retained of the original structure was “the tower with a flight of external steps; part of the walls of the nave, the squint between the tower and chancel, a couple of corbels, three Perpendicular windows, a Norman font and a curious shaped stoup”

The low saddle backed tower is of two stories, the upper approached by an exterior staircase. The ground storey has the usual plain vaulting. The roof is tiled. The font basin externally 23 inches by 21 ½ inches and internally 17 ½ height 38 inches. It has been slightly redressed. The so-called stoup is a domestic mortar, probably of 16th century date. visited 4th May 1920

The Church has an unusual plan. The chancel has a north wall in line with the three bay arcade between a wider nave and a north aisle with a squint. Tiny Chapels open off the SW corner of the chancel and SE corner of the nave, and a small gabled tower stands north of the aisle. The whole south side was rebuilt in 1870; in the porch is a tiny figure of a civilian under a canopy. There is a scalloped late Norman font.

Described as 'Ecclesia vine Osmundi,' Uzmaston was one of the churches granted by Wizo, the Fleming, Walter his son, and Walter the grandson of Wizo, to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem at Slebech. - Alselm's Confirm. charter.

In September., 1301, the preceptor of Slebech gave the advowson of Uzmaston to the precentor and chapter of St Davids, for the maintenance of the fabric of the cathedral of St Davids, and in March ,1302, this grant was confirmed by Bishop David Martin.

It will be seen from the extract given below, that Bacon's Liber Regis attributes the dedication of the Church to St. Ishmael, but it is evident that this must be a mistake, or else a subsequent dedication, as it is recorded in the Stat. Menev that in the reign of Edw. I, Geoffrey, son of Robert, 'dominus de villa Osmundi,' granted, for the good of his soul, to the Church of 'St David de villa Osmundi' and to Master Walter de Greswent probably a mistake of the scribe for 'Trefwent' the rector of the said Church and his successors, a messuage, garden, and an acre of land adjoining the road leading from Uzmaston to Wiston.

At the time of the grant in 1302 referred to above, the rectorship of Uzmaston was stated to be vacant owing to the resignation of Master Walter de Trefwent, the late rector. - Stat. Menev. This is the only record of an individual rector of the Church.

In 1554 the tithes of Uzmaston were leased to William Philipps of Picton, Pems, esq., for 40 years at the annual rent of 6s. 8d; the tenant to supply a curate to serve the Church. This lease was renewed to the same lessee, and on the same terms in July 1565.

In July, 1600, John Philipps of Picton, esq., obtained a lease at the same rent for the lives of himself, his wife Anne, and his eldest son, Richard Philipps, and in 1661 Sir Erasmus Philipps, Bart., was granted a lease for 21 years at the same rent.

In 1682 George Lucy, gent, was given a lease for 21 years, which was renewed in July, 1690, to the same lessee. This lease seems to have descended, on the death of George Lucy, the tenant, to his wife Elizabeth, as in the Chapter Records there is a memorandum that a lease of the tithes for 16 years should be given to her. This intention, however, was never carried out, as on 24 July, 1706, a lease of the rectory of Uzmaston for 21 years was granted to Richard Sparks, gent. Elizabeth Lucy, the tenant, consenting through her son George Lucy, gent.

In 1718 and again in 1734 the lease was renewed by Richard Sparks, who was an alderman of Haverfordwest, and died prior to 7 Mar., 1736-7, the rent on the latter occasion being advanced to £15 6s. 8d and the curate's stipend being fixed at £10.

In 1741 a lease of the tithes was granted for 21 years to Sparks Martin of Withy Bush, Pembs., gent., and John Barron, of Haverfordwest, at the rent of £15 6s. 8d. and a fine of £20 and in 1748 and 1756 the lease was renewed to the same lessees at the same rent as before, the fines paid being respectively £20 and £24.

In 1763 the tithes were leased for 21 years at the same rent to Sparks Martin, esq.. and David Hughes, gent, the assignee of John Barron, MD., the fine paid being 20 guineas.

In 1781 the Chapter decided that the next lease should be at rack rent without any fine, and in pursuance of this resolution, the tithes were leased for 21 years to Canon William Holcombe, at a rent of £66.

In 1806 the tithes were rented by auction, and John Phelps of Withy Bush being the highest bidder, a lease for 21 years was granted to him at the rent of £135.

1827. The tithes were rented to Sparks Martin Phelps, esq., for 21 years at the rent of £120.

The present Church of Uzmaston must have been restored or rather re-built about the year 1870, as an Act of the Chapter on 25 July in that year orders the chapter seal to be affixed to the deed authorising the re-building of the Church.

On 20 Dec., 1907, a faculty was granted for putting up a window in the parish Church in memory of Mr. George Bland and Mrs. Anne Bland.

1999 St Ismael's Church, Uzmaston RCAHMW

Dating to at least the early 13th century, St Ismael's Church, the parish Church of Uzmaston, is dedicated to the son of Budic, King of Armorica (France). St Ismael returned to Dyfyd with his brothers (where they previously lived in exile with their father) and became a disciple of St David. Upon the death of St David, St. Ismael was consecrated Bishop by his uncle St. Teilo.

In 1230, Uzmaston Church was one of those granted to Wizo the Fleming and his son and grandson (both named Walter) to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem at Slebech.

The Church was virtually rebuilt in 1870-73; renovated in 1991-92; and further restored in 1999.

The State of Education in Wales 1847 - The parishes of Uzmaston and Boulston

This parish includes , besides a rural district, one of the suburbs of Haverfordwest called Cartlet. The National school is close to the Church which is about a mile from the suburb; the two dame schools are in the suburb. The parishioners are either farmers and labourers or small tradesmen and mechanics. Labourers get 6s., 7s., and 8s per week on their own finding or 4s with food. Mechanics get from 12s to 16s per week. The principal landed proprietors are three in number and non resident. They and the Dean and Chapter of St David's (patrons of the living) contribute £12 per annum to the support of the schools. There are five farmers in the parish paying upwards of £100 per annum in rent; of these one has no family, another no family old enough for school, a third sends his children to the National school, the other two (being close to Cartlet) send their children to the dame schools there. The people can generally read. All the children in the parish were said to be attending school.

Village school — I visited this school on the 7th January 1847; it is constantly superintended, and in a great measure supported by the Misses Acland, of Boulston, and the Rev S O Meares the Incumbent..

The school buildings, at the time of my visit, consisted only of a thatched mud hovel, which was made into a single room calculated to accommodate in winter one half, and in summer one third of the children resorting to it.

The Master, besides being trained for six months at the Sanctuary, had been previously instructed for 18 months by the Rev S O Meares. His training in London, including travelling expenses, had , by his meritorious economy, barely cost £20. Mr Meares considered (and justly) that the parochial Clergy might do much in this manner to supplement the normal schools. The master of Uzmaston school appeared to have made the most of his advantages.

The inside of the school building was fitted up so as to turn its narrow dimensions to the best account. There were galleries of desks and benches along the walls. The centre was left free for the master and monitors to move about in and employ the black board. There were maps and cards hanging up. The master's desk had to be pushed into a little corner at the upper end of the room. Everything was very neat and orderly.

I gave each Child in the first class (20) something to write from memory on their slates. For the most part these questions were exceedingly well answered.

The master questioned the second class (21) in geography pointing to the map of the world. He did it with spirit and intelligence. No one in the class could find Palestine on the map. A boy from the head class came and pointed to it and also to Greece. The second class Read St Luke xii, sixteen of them with ease.

The first class Read Acts xvii all of them with ease. The master questioned them as before. Such questions as were proposed in arithmetic were well answered. They also answered simple questions from early English history.

There is a clothing club attached to the school -the pence are paid on Sunday, and are doubled at the end of the year by the patronesses. This forms and inducement to attend the Sunday school regularly.

The children were clean and well clad, and the master seemed in good spirits and fond of his work. The school required and deserved a better building; subscriptions were on foot , and grants hoped, for this purpose.

[The old school was soon after replaced —

According to RCAHMS The former National School at Uzmaston now closed, has a date stone of 1847]

Mrs Harries School – The mistress spoke English tolerably well. She has kept school for many years. The furniture consisted of only a few benches. – visited 2 January 1847 W M Morris Assistant

Miss Price's School – The governess seemed to have received a good education. The furniture consisted of plenty of benches and tables, but no maps or prints were hanging on the walls. – visited 2 January 1847 W M Morris Assistant

The annals of crime in Pembrokeshire present a some what singular history. For ninety years past 4033 not an execution has taken place. The last was one that excited a good deal of sympathy. Roblin a man who was found guilty, first of manslaughter, and that verdict being refused by the presiding Judge, afterwards of murder, though it was very generally felt that the first verdict would have satisfied justice, was hanged on Easter Monday 1821. In those days it was a short shrift, as he was only tried on Good Friday. So great was the horror occasioned by this execution, that the hangman was never known.

Walton East

Topographical Dictionary of Wales Walton East 1839 Lewis

Walton (EAST), a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dungledy, county of Pembroke, in South Wales, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Haverfordwest; containing 274 inhabitants. This parish constituted a part of the ample possessions of the commandery of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, at Slebech, to which establishment it was given by its Norman proprietor, Walter de Wale, from whom it derived its name, Wale's town, or Walton. The scenery, though by no means rich, is less dreary than that in some other parts of the county; and Penty Park, the property of a branch of the Philipps family, of Picton Castle, forms a pleasing and ornamental feature in the landscape. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant; net income, £60; patron and impropriator, Lloyd Philipps, esq., whose tithes have been commuted at a rent-charge of £170. The Church, dedicated to St. Mary , is a very small rude edifice, consisting only of a nave, without tower or spire. The sum of £5 per annum, subsequently reduced to £3, and now discontinued, was left in 1734 by James Philipps, esq., of Tenby, chargeable on his estate of Penty Park, for the education of seven children of the parish. A day school is held, unconnected with any particular religious body; and the Calvinistic Methodists have a Sunday school.

There seems little doubt that Walton East is the Church described as 'Ecclesia Sancti Petri de Walestuna' in Dungledy, which Wizo, Lord of Wiston, and Walter his son, and Walter the son of the said Walter, granted to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. - Bishop Anselm's Confirmatory charter.

This being so it would indicate that there has either been a change in the dedication, or else that it is erroneously attributed to St. Mary in Bacon's Liber Regis.

In 1594 the benefice was described as a Curacy, and in the hands of the Queen as late belonging to the preceptor [of Slebech]. - Owen's Pem.

The only reference to this benefice in the Valor Eccl. is in the list of churches appropriated to the preceptory of Slebeche, in which appears the following entry:- Ecclesia de Walton xj'i.

Under the heading "Not in Charge":- Walton East Cur. (St. Mary). James Philipps, esq.. £10 certified value. - Bacon's Liber Regis.

—Village School --- On the 8th of December I visited the above school. It was held in a schoolroom on Walton Green. The building was in pretty good repair. It was lighted by two small glazed windows. The floor was of the bare earth, very uneven and rather damp. The furniture consisted of a desk for the master, two for the scholars, and a few benches , all in indifferent repair. There was a fire in an iron stove placed in the middle of the room. The steam which arose from it was quite insufferable, so much so that I was obliged to keep both door and window open to enable me to breathe. The master remarked that it was “bad to a stranger, but nothing to those who were used to it”. He received annually £4 from the earl of Cawder and £2 from Lloyd Phillips esq. of Mabws Cardiganshire, for educating fifteen poor children of the parish of Walton East. I heard a class of seventeen Read the 1st chapter of St John's Gospel; seven out of the number Read pretty correctly.

The master did not question them at all after they had done reading.

Knew their multiplication table pretty well. Wages were in the parish 8d per day and food. The condition of the labourers was very poor. David Lewis Assistant

A roughly circular earthwork 360 feet in length and 300 ft in breadth, standing on pac Castell a field about half a mile north of the village of Walton East. The defences consist of a single enclosing rampart, a ditch to the east, and an outwork protecting the entrance on the west side. The rampart which is at its best on the east rises some 4ft from the level of the interior, and falls 8ft to a ditch that is hewn through the rock to a length of 270 ft. The entrance is midway on the west front; it is 20ft wide and well preserved. Protecting the entrance , on a slightly lower level, is an enclosure 220ft by 90ft in width, the rampart of which has an average height of 3ft. The entrance to the outwork is placed immediately opposite the main entrance to the camp and has a width of 30ft. The protecting rampart is not joined to the chief bank there being a distance of 20 ft between them at either end of the latter. visited 11th October 1914

Walton (or Vicarage) Rath.

This work standing some 300yds south of the parish Church, and known locally as “Vicarage Rath” is in a very ruinous state. It has a length of some 140 ft and a breadth of about 90 ft. The enclosed bank . Much disturbed in places, has an average rise of one ft and a fall of not more than 2ft to a ditch that has almost disappeared; the rock along the line of the ditch has been scarped in places and possibly the ditch was originally fed from a contiguous spring. The entrance was probably to the west..

There is another enclosure also called “Vicarage Rath” of which there is at present scarcely a trace –
RCAM 13th July 1915.

The west Rath

All that remains of this work is the outline of a single slightly bowed line of rampart on a field known as Castle. It was constructed to defend a Ford of Cartlett Brook. The rampart, which must have enclosed a fairly large area has now a length of only 300 ft and a height of barely 1ft, and it is doubtful if it ever formed a circle. It would seem to have had a ditch. visited 13th July 1915.

west Rath is an earthwork enclosure complex, set on ground falling to the south-west, centring on an oval enclosure, about 34m north-west to south-east by 24m. It is levelled into the slope, embanked on the uphill and terraced on the downhill side; this is set within an irregular banked and ditched enclosure complex, apparently featuring an inturned entrance on the north about 130m north-east to south-west by 100m, resting on natural scarps along the south-east.

Walton west

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales

Walton (west), a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Rhôs, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Haverfordwest; containing 544 inhabitants. This parish is situated upon the coast of St. St Bride's Bay, by which it is bounded on the west; the adjacent country is destitute of beauty, but the view over the bay is very fine, and enlivened by the passing and repassing of vessels. On the shore is the small watering-place of Broadhaven, much frequented in summer, celebrated for the extent and hardness of its sands, and well supplied with fish of different kinds. The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £6. 13. 4., and endowed with £400 royal bounty; patron, the Rev. Robert Ferrier: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £134. 15.; and there is a glebe of one acre, valued at £1. 10. per annum. The Church is not entitled to architectural notice. Here are two places of worship for dissenters, and two Sunday schools are held, one of them in connexion with the Established Church.

1851 29th August Walton West Parish Church Glynne

This Church is now in a most forlorn state of dilapidation but improvement is contemplated. The nave has a very low and narrow north aisle. The chancel is properly developed, and there is a west tower. Over the east gable of the nave is a Bell cot for one Bell. The tower is patched, and partly rebuilt. It has a saddle roof, and the west gable is terminated by a Bell cot for two bells. Its lower part internally has a rude stone vault, and opening to the nave by a very plain Pointed arch. It has but little architectural character but a double window with two obtuse heads. The windows are all bad and modern except one on the north of the chancel, now closed which is a single square headed light, trefoiled. The chancel arch is but small, opened in a plain wall or mass of masonry, and so strangely misshapen that it is difficult to comprehend what it could originally have been. There is on the south side a very large hagioscope with straight sided arch. There are two very low flattened arches between the nave and aisle, not exactly similar, without mouldings, and with plain wall pier. The aisle seems never to have had windows. There is much dead wall about the chancel arch. In the chancel, on the south side is a stone bench, and another at the west of the aisle. Under the east window is an arch, closed externally; and there is a small rude piscina. The masonry near the east end is varied and evidently of different ages; but it is not easy to say what is the architectural character of the Church, from its rudeness as well as its mutilation. The font has the common square bowl, scalloped below, and a cylindrical stem. The interior is dilapidated to an incredible degree, and the ground rises high against the walls.

1856 September

Walton west Church is now in an excellent state, thoroughly restored, and partially rebuilt; a small aisle or Chapel added on the north of the chancel, opened by a low flat arch. The new inserted windows are lancets, some trefoiled; the east window of three lights; the seats low, open and uniform.

1895 Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmin

Presently the blue sea opens out ahead, and the lane makes a sudden turn over against a lonely country Church. As we approach it, the little edifice presents such a curious medley of gables and turrets, as to tempt us to closer inspection.

Walton-West Church has been carefully and wisely restored of recent years, and not before it was needed, for it is on record that in the ' good old times ' two boys were kept at work on rainy Sundays, sweeping the water that flowed in at the porch into a pit formed in a disused pew. Eventually matters were brought to a climax by the snow falling through a rent in the roof, and lodging upon the bald head of an ancient worshipper! As usual, the tower, which appears never to have been completed, is the oldest remaining portion of the fabric ; indeed, it has been considered as pre-Norman, a stone having, as we are informed, been found in the wall bearing the date AD 993. A small effigy, apparently of the Elizabethan period, built into the interior of the tower, is usually supposed to represent the patron saint of the Church. Upon the north side of the chancel stands a well-proportioned Chapel that formerly appertained to the family of Lort-Philipps.

The Parish Church Dedicated to St Davids (possibly a modern Dedication) – RCAM

The building with the exception of the tower, is practically a modern structure; It consists of chancel, Chapel on the north side, nave, north side aisle, western tower and south porch. The tower is now crowned by a saddle-back roof, but the sudden ending of the internal stairs (twenty three in number) shows it to have been shortened; local tradition speaks of great damage done to the edifice by a storm. It has two storeys, the lower being vaulted and opening to the nave by a plain pointed arch. A rough buttress has been built against its west wall, and on this buttress has been erected a double Bell-cote, whilst a single and now empty Bell-cote crowns the east nave wall. In the interior west wall of the tower is a small and much obliterated effigy, possibly that of a female, about 18in in height. It is too defaced to permit of detailed description. The font basin 26in by 25in externally and 21in by 20in internally is of Norman type, and stands upon a circular shaft and square base, the total height of the structure being 33ins. visited 3rd September 1920.

Church All Saints(?)

Tower is 14c, the rest rebuilt 1854. Has 12c Norman Font and a 10c grave stone.

The short west tower with an impossibly low doorway to its staircase in a SW turret is 14th century. The font is of c1200. The nave and chancel were also of that period but have been rebuilt above the foundations in about 1854. There is a tiny female effigy. In the Lady Chapel is a rounded 10th century stone with Latin wheel cross, showing Irish influence, found in the Churchyard by gravediggers.

Walton west — There is here a beautiful little Elizabethan Chalice, retaining its Paten cover, with shape of the conventional type and decoration varying in having one band of interlacing and foliated strap-work engraved round the bowl, whilst a criss-cross and dot ornament takes the place of the usual vertical line moulding beneath the bowl and on the foot. The Hall marks are the small black letter r for 1574 with maker's Mark M as in O. E. P. at 1565. The knop on the stem is covered with intermittent lines Height, 6 in.; diam. of bowl, 2½in.; depth, 3 in.; weight, 4oz. 6dwts. The Paten cover carries the same Hall marks whilst on the foot or handle is engraved within a circle the date " 1573 ". There is also on the cover a belt of similar strap-work which like that on the cup intersects three times, a spray being carried above and below each intersection. Diam., 2 in. ; weight, 1 oz. 10 dwts. Both pieces are in excellent condition. The chalice at Camrose is by the same maker and of the same date.—There is also a Service of plated metal, consisting of Chalice, Paten and Flagon. The cup is 6 in. in height and is ornamented with I. H.S. and cross within a glory. The paten is 8 in. in diameter and the flagon 11 inches high.

The rectory of Walton west appears to have been in private patronage at all events since 1536. It seems to have belonged to Henry Catharne and others at that date, but in 1594 the patrons are said to be the families of Newport, Stepneth [Stepley], Woodford, Kette [Kettill] and Longvill in right of Catharn. – Owen's Pembroke.

These were probably all representatives of Henry Catharne; in fact Stepney, Woodford, and Kettill are no doubt the Alban Stepney, Thomas Woodford, and William Kettill, who married three of the coheiresses of Thomas Catharne, the son of the Henry Catharne in question.

Parish of Walton west – On the 6th January I visited the above parish. The day-school was one of Mrs Bevan's circulating schools. It was held in the parish church. The master had formerly been a Mason, but from an accident was incapacitated from following his trade, and therefore applied for and obtained one of these mastership. There were a great number of children on the books, but the master told me attendance was irregular. There was a Baptist Chapel at Broadhaven but no Sunday-school held since the coming of Mrs Bevan's school into the parish. The children all went to Church Sunday-school. Mrs Bowen a lady living at Little Haven and one who is very active in promoting Sunday Schools, informed me that wages in the parish were 8d per day with food or 1s 4d without. Labourers were in general a very industrious and sober class of men. There was no gentleman possessed of a considerable property living in the parish. There had not been one of Mrs Bevan's schools before the present held in the parish for the last thirty years.-- David Lewis Assistant.

Little Haven-

Little Haven is a picturesque village facing a small sandy cove with pebbles above the high tide line. The beach faces north west and offers some shelter from the prevailing south westerly winds. In the past, locally mined coal was shipped from Little Haven in small sailing vessels.

Little Haven Fenton, Tours 1811 located next door to Little Haven. The seafront borders a large, west facing, open expanse of beach, hem

Hence to Little Haven, separated from Broad Haven by a narrow rocky projection, but not such as prevents a ride over the sands without it at low water. Little Haven affords shelter for small country vessels frequenting it in summer to ship culm raised near this place in great quantities, and of a peculiarly excellent quality, an officer of the customs being here stationed to clear them out.

Broadhaven – When I stayed at Broadhaven in the 1970's I talked to some of the older local people and they told me about places where they said coal-Mining had taken place. I have since tried to find records but as far back as Fenton, Tours published in 1811, I could find no reference and Fenton records it as a holiday resort with no mention of Mining although he does refer to Little Haven as exporting culm in summer.

Broadhaven

Recently a report came to my notice and I quote a small portion from it.

The report is the published product of a study made by the British Geological Survey (BGS) in response to a public concern regarding geohazards affecting Broad Haven Primary School, Broad Haven, Haverfordwest, Pembrokeshire. BGS Enquiry IDA 165862.

Serious problem regarding drainage and ground stability in an area bordering the village of Broad Haven on the South Pembrokeshire coast. His enquiry concerned the possibility of old mine-workings in an area of land that he farmed adjacent to Broad Haven PriMary School, where there had been problems with flooding after several periods of heavy rainfall during the wet summer and autumn of 2008. During a site visit by Dr J.R. Davies of the British Geological Survey (BGS) on 11 th October, it was noted that there was continuing substantial run-off from the adjacent field into the school site. The school lies in the floor of a shallow valley , down-slope and immediately west of the field from which run-off occurred.

Coal Mining History

Mining within the Pembrokeshire Coalfield appears to have reached its zenith in the latter half of the 18th Century, from when it rapidly declined. As a result, sources of information are lacking for large parts of the coalfield, and the relationships between coal seams within different areas are not fully understood. Much of the coal was worked in a piecemeal manner from opencast pockets ('slashes' or 'slatches') as, and when, they were discovered, although underground working also took place.

In the Broad Haven area, both methods were in operation at various times. Large opencast workings for 'Culm' (crushed and tectonised coal) took place in the valley immediately north of the Royal Hotel, whereas to the east and south-east, coal was worked at depth from a number of mine shafts. In this area, which extends as far as Broadway, coal was worked from at least three closely-spaced seams; these are, in descending order, the Foxhill, Migrement and Coal veins. The seams were exploited over a wide area, and, as a result, were considered to be uneconomic when investigated for their opencast resource potential in the late 1940's.

Mine Workings

The mines east of Broad Haven were drained by a 'level' which was driven from a point within Mr Clark's field eastwards towards Foxhill Farm, and then north-eastwards towards Broadway. A number of shafts are situated along the line of the level, and at least four of these are shown on the 1907 geological map within Mr Clark's field. The two westernmost airshafts are shown as dashed circular features on the 1889 OS map and it is possible that these had collapsed or were partially filled by this time. The map also shows two further mineshaft's in the upper part of the field, close to its south eastern boundary and more occur nearby within adjacent fields. Small areas of spoil that previously surrounded these features are also shown on the geological map.

They are now recognisable by areas of dark soil within the upper part of the field. An area of tipped and partially re-excavated material may represent the remains of one of the spoil heaps. The survey of 1907 also shows a 'hole', which was probably a 'crown hole' (a circular depression caused by collapse above a void) in the upper part of the field at However, none of the features identified on the geological map (drainage level, shafts or crown hole) are visible at surface at present, and it is likely that they have been filled in and ploughed over.

Walwyn's Castle, or in Welsh Castell Gualchmai where it is recorded that the body of Gualchmai, of a gigantic stature, was dug up in the time of William the Conqueror. This Walwyn was said to be the cousin of Arthur, and was Regulus of that portion of the island called Galway, and that driven out of his own kingdom he was wrecked on this coast and here buried. For what reason, it may now be difficult perhaps to ascertain, this place became entitled to such distinction, but Walwyn's Castle if it had not all the distinguishing features of a Lord-ship marcher, yet in many respects so resembled it that it is seldom mentioned but in union with that of Larharn or Talacharn, of which the famous Guy de Bryan was Lord, and by virtue of that tenure was summoned to parliament. Nothing now remains of its primitive consequence, if it ever had any, but the mound of earth that might once have been surmounted with a castelet, for probably the bank had been the tumulus that covered the skeleton of the gigantic hero Walwyn, and was on that account so honoured, as it appears to have been for centuries by being an appendage to a Lord-ship marcher and given name to a comote of this hundred comprising the six parishes to the westward of it.

Farther on occurs Ramas, or as it sometimes is supposed to be more properly called, Romans Castle, from having some relation to that people, but there is nothing in the form of the earthworks thrown up there that differs in character from others in that line, except in extent. The chain of posts seems to have been established at the time when the Danes began to annoy the coast by their frequent descents on it, a position of such strength as enabled the natives effectually to check their progress up the country, leaving the more rocky and inaccessible parts of the peninsula open to their desultory depredations.

RCAM

Parish of Walwyn's Castle

The district of which this parish may be regarded as the centre, is, from the Archaeological point of view, one of the most interesting in the county. From the mound adjacent to the parish Church, or, still better, from the summit of the Church tower, the eye beholds at least two of the avenues by which hordes of Goidelle Celts may have entered the larger island of Britain from that of Ireland or withdrawn there from, according to the view taken of the Irish Gaels as fleeing before the incoming Brythons or as settlers in a new country

Slightly more than three miles north west of Walwyn's Church and Castle is the beautiful strand of Broadhaven, with, at its southern extremity, the small but extremely snug inlet called Little Haven probably of greater area in the early centuries of the Christian era than it is at present. Turning southwards the spectator from Walwyn's Church tower will notice at a slightly greater distance away the ideally placed inlet of Sandy Haven, which was navigable for small flat bottomed craft half way to Walwyn's Castle.

In perfectly favourable weather sea forces, either to or from Ireland, would probably betake themselves to broad or Little Haven; the neighbouring parish of St Brides as well as the broad expanse of the sea between the harbours of the south-east of Ireland and those of Pembrokeshire which is known as St Brides's Bay, are doubtless the scenes of their activities in the later years of the Roman domination and the early period of British Christianity.

But it is clear that the external traces of Goidels who occupied or had settled in the district and had probably arrived as well as left by the Broad Haven route, were almost entirely swept away by the Norse invaders and settlers of the 8th to the 11th centuries. The renaming of the place-names which the district underwent proves at once the thoroughness with which the operation was carried out and also that it almost certainly proceeded from both north and south of Walwyn's Castle. The names within an area of several miles are almost entirely Norse, with an infusion of what appears to be names of Low German origin due possibly to the Flemish settlement; but the survival of a few Welsh forms of Byronic, rather than Goidelic, type serves to show that the earlier people were not entirely exterminated.

The Archaeological evidence obtained from our survey, though much more difficult to interpret, points to similar conclusions. along the line of SandyHaven Pill and the little stream into which it flows past the bluff on which Walwyn's Castle is placed, is a series of camps of quite unusual strength. We proceed to enumerate them, so far as they fall within the limits of the parish of Walwyn's Castle but it should be understood that such a survey will overstep the artificial boundaries set up at a much later period than that with which we are dealing.

1839 Walwyn's Castle Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

Walwyn's-Castle, a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Rhôs, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest; containing 338 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near St. St Bride's Bay, is called by the Welsh Castell-Gwalchmai, a name probably derived from the tradition that Gwalchmai, cousin of King Arthur, and a warrior of gigantic stature, having been driven from his inheritance in Galway, was wrecked off this coast, and interred here: his remains are said to have been found in the reign of William the Conqueror. The living is a rectory, rated in the King's Books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor; present net income, £270, with a glebe-house. The Church, dedicated to St. James, is an ancient edifice, not remarkable for any architectural details. A day school and a Sunday school are held, in connexion with the Established Church. A tumulus near the Church is supposed to mark the site of an ancient Castle, but no particulars of any fortress are known; there are no vestiges of buildings of any kind, and the artificial mound may be only a sepulchral memorial raised over the remains of Gwalchmai, or some other chieftain.

Nooks and Corners 1895 Timmins

In an out-of-the-way spot, about a mile to the southward, lies the secluded hamlet of Walwyn's Castle. The distance is nearly doubled by the crooked lanes, but a pleasant field-path saves a longer detour. From the brow of the Hill we have three churches full in view, in diminishing perspective — Walwyn's Castle, down in the valley ; Robeston west farther away ; and Steynton,

The Church of Walwyn's Castle stands upon a gentle eminence that slopes to a hollow, wooded dingle overhanging a streamlet, whose waters meander away to a creek of the ubiquitous Haven.

The salient feature of the edifice is its tall, slender tower, and narrow stair-turret rising to the embattled roof. Upon the southern side the land falls away steeply, and the brow of the bank is scored with the grassy mounds of the ancient camp or Castle, whence the place derives its curious name.

In an old black-letter chronicle of the sixteenth century it is recorded, ' In the Province of Wales which is callyd Roose, the sepulchre of Walwyne was found. He reigned in that parte of Britain which is callyd Walwythia. The Tombe was found in the days of William the Conqueror, King of England, upon the sea side, and contayned in length fourteen foote.'

A local variation of this time-honoured fable avers that Walwyn was buried on the site of the above-mentioned camp, and a sort of arched aperture, now fallen in and well-nigh obliterated, was formerly pointed out as the burial-place of this very ' lofty ' hero.

Church of St. James

(Glynne Notes Arch Camb 1885 V ii 217)

Walwyn's Castle (St. James).

1851. April 29,

The plan is a tolerably spacious nave and a chancel, without aisles, a western tower, and north porch. The tower is plain and poor, without buttresses, and of no particular architectural character. The lower part has the usual stone vault, and opens to the nave by a plain arch. The north door has a round arch. On the north side, near the west end, is a single lancet-window ; the other windows of the nave are modern. The chancel- arch is plain and obtuse. In its north pier is a square aperture for a squint. On each side of the chancel, near its west end, is a curious projection opening to the interior by a depressed arch ; each of them has externally a cornice of plain corbels. These projections are not uncommon in Pembrokeshire. In the east wall, internally, are two brackets, and a long piscina with trefoiled head and good mouldings, the bowl octagonal. The south-east window of the chancel consists of two lights slightly oged and trefoiled. The roof is open and plain. The font has a small square bowl on a cylindrical stem, with square plinth. Against some parts of the walls of the nave are plain brackets. The Church is newly pewed. The pulpit is in the centre.

The churchyard is extremely large, — a circumstance not very infrequent in South Wales, even in small parishes.

The churches of Nolton, Haroldston, Walwyn Castle, and others about, seem to form a kind of connecting link between the small, towerless churches of the Welsh part of Pembrokeshire, and the peculiar ecclesiastical buildings, with lofty towers, of the English districts.

The Parish Church dedicated to St James RCAM

With the exception of the base of the tower the Church has been completely rebuilt on earlier foundations. The tower, of which only the lower story remains has a plain vault. The plan shows a chancel 24ft by 14 ¼ ft, nave, 47 ½ ft by 20ft, choir recesses in the chancel 5ft by 6 ½ ft, and tower 14ft by 15ft externally. The earlier font base 21ins square externally, with a circular bowl 19in diameter is in use visited 31st August 1920

Holland family of Walwyn Castle and Robeston west – The Rev T G Marshal wrote

Towards the end of the 16th century, Robert Holland, M.A., in 1581, of Jesus College, Cambridge, a younger son of the family which had been settled for several centuries previously at Conway (where they became the principal landowner, and where the Church abounds with their monuments), migrated to South Wales, and was presented by the Picton Castle family to the Vicarage of Llanddowror, and by the Crown to the Rectory of Prendergast (1591). He married Jane, daughter of Robert Meyler, of Haverfordwest, and was the author of a poetical 'Holie Historie of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ' in English, as well as several prose works in Welsh. Resigning his former preferments, he was presented in 1607 to the Rectory of Walwyn's Castle, and in 1613 to that of Robeston west. Both of these Crown livings were held by him together until his death in 1633. His descendants held lands in Walwyn's Castle, and several neighbouring parishes, certainly as early as 1634, and for a hundred years afterwards. His son Nicholas was presented to the Crown Vicarage of Marloes, and he had a son also named Nicholas, who practised as a lawyer in Haverfordwest, residing also at Walwyn's Castle. This latter, Nicholas Holland, married (1) Dorothy Laughame of Orlandon; (2) Eliza Davies, widow of T. Couzens; (3) Martha, also a widow, whose family name has not been preserved; (4) Eleanor Hathias. It was Martha, the third wife of Nicholas Holland, who presented the Chalice to Robeston west. She died in 1704, and was buried at St. Mary's, Haverfordwest. Her Husband died in 1718, and appears to have been buried in Walwyn's Castle Church, where his widow Eleanor directed her own interment to take place (1730)

Wogan John 1636 the son of Sir William Wogan was sheriff in 1636 and sat for the county of Pembroke in the parliaments of 1614, 1625, and 1640 he had an elder son, Wogan Thomas 1646 M.P. for Cardigan in 1646. This Thomas, who succeeded to Wiston and the Wogan Irish estates, which were confiscated in 1662, but afterwards restored to his brother Roland, was one of those who signed the death warrant of King Charles I. At the Restoration he escaped to Utrecht, where he is heard of engaged in plots in 1666. Fenton gives the tradition how he afterwards returned to the county and lived on charity in the Church porch of Walwyn's Castle, where he was one morning found dead.

Fenton Tour p 160

“ Soon after the restoration an unknown person appeared in the neighbourhood of Walwyn Castle, seemed always melancholy and dejected, and studiously shunned all society, refusing every invitation from the country people to their houses, and evading as much as possible every enquiry. He staid day and night in the Church porch, where he was relieved by the neighbours, who remarked that he had every appearance of a gentleman, and that his hands were delicately White. He was generally believed to be the Wogan (one of the house of Wiston) who sat as one of Charles's judges at his trial. When asked his name he said it was Drinkwater. He was at length found dead in the Church porch.

Wogan Judge, Walwyn and the Roundhead

Judge Wogan was one of the fifty nine Regicide Judges and officials who in 1649 conducted the trial and execution of King Charles I.

After the restoration of Charles II to the throne in 1660 these regicides were excepted from the Amnesty granted by royal authority to all other political offenders. That year ten were pronounced guilty nine of which were hanged drawn and quartered and one hanged. Two years later three more were hanged drawn and quartered while nineteen served life imprisonment. A few were pardoned but even the graves of those that had died were desecrated. Some escaped abroad to countries in Europe or to the American colonies. One who is listed as escaping to Holland was Judge Thomas Wogan . Originally he had been held at York Castle until 1664 when it is recorded that he escaped to the Netherlands. Previously three of the regicides who had escaped there had been arrested by the British Ambassador. returned to England and executed so it seems a very unsafe destination to head for.

But what has this to do with Pembrokeshire, I could not find many reference to a Thomas Wogan of around that time but Brown in his History of Haverfordwest with that of some Pembrokeshire Parishes originally written about the 1880's but revised and published in May 1914 by subscription has an interesting story about Walwyn's Castle Church and I quote

“Well, it must have been some years after Cromwell had passed to his long account, and the country folk were beginning to forget the troubles the land had suffered—for this part of Pembrokeshire, from its vicinity to Milford Haven, had had its full share in the struggles, and now a new generation was growing up,— that an aged man appeared in the neighbourhood one day, and sat down on that same old bench in the Church porch, with the air of one who was weary of life and its surroundings. It may have been that at first a feeling of curiosity, not unmixed with awe, crept over the rustics as they observed the weird appearance and strange manner of a visitor who was evidently used to other scenes and ways of life. Pity, in time, would lead them to proffer him some simple service, but he needed none. He seldom quitted the quiet resting-place he had chosen day and night still found him there sad, silent, and alone. The summer's heat and winter's cold seemed to pass over him unheeded. But one morning the stranger "was not"—only that which men, often using the phrase without noting its significance, call "his remains." The tenant had quitted the worn dwelling and departed to the undiscovered country. And who, think you, was this mysterious personage who was consigned to Mother Earth by the simple rustics, with the beautiful and universal expression of the hope of our Church, though he was entirely unknown to those who in charity buried him?

Long afterwards it was discovered that he was one of the Regicide Judges, who, feeling that he needed mercy at the hands of the Judge of the whole earth, and cowering under the terrible responsibility which he had once assumed, chose this obscure spot to hide his head and die

Site Description

The earthworks of the medieval Castle occupy the southern end of a steep-sided inland promontory and are thought, though not proven, to have utilised an earlier prehistoric inland promontory fort; one of a number situated along the river to SandyHaven Pill. Tradition also associates the site to the grave of King Arthur's nephew, Gawain.

The medieval Castle was situated in the Cantref of Rhos, an area settled by the Anglo-Normans from 1093, brought under control by Roger de Montgomery's son Arnulf from his base at Pembroke. This area was subsequently reorganised as the Lordship of Haverford, initially subject to the Earls of Pembroke. From 1247 onwards, the Lordship also contained the large barony or sublordship of Walwyn's Castle, commonly Independent of Haverford and for which the Castle here was the main stronghold and administrative centre. By the mid thirteenth century the Castle had been acquired by the de Bryan (de Brian) family, whose main seat was at Laugharne and thus the Castle never further developed and remained a predominantly earthwork Castle Throughout its existence.

The earthwork remains comprise a 5m high curving bank that crosses the neck of the promontory on its north side, cut by a 4m wide entrance. Slight traces of an external ditch survive, as does an outwork surrounding the entrance that defines a circular area 56m in diameter. Traces of stone and the outline of a probable curving structure survive here. The interior area of the Castle is an irregular roughly tear drop shape, 1.3ha in extent. On its east, south and west sides it is predominantly defended by steep natural slopes with the exception of a 75m stretch along the west side which has been artificially enhanced. It is unclear whether a similar although much slighter enhancement along the east side also relates to the Castle or is of a later date. The castles interior is divided in two by a straight section of bank and ditch running across the promontory's narrowest point. This stops short of the western edge of the promontory and thus provided an entrance into the lower Bailey. At its eastern end the dividing bank curves outwards to create a roughly square motte nearly 6m high by 13m wide. A depression on top of the motte is likely to Mark the site of a circular tower and here there are also traces of stonework, which may indicate both a stone tower as well as a wall along the top of the bank. The only other extant remain within the interior is an earthwork running southwards and dividing the upper Bailey, most likely representing a later field division.

A detailed survey of the Castle was carried out by RCAHMW and the Walwyn's Castle Historical Society in 2009.

Syke Rath -

This earthwork has been formed by drawing three slightly curved lines across the neck of a little bluff that projects into the valley of the SandyHaven stream. The inner and middle banks are formidable defences but the outer is no more than 3ft high on the average. The entrance was on the easter side of the enclosure, where the first two banks are joined to form a platform --visited 31st August 1920

Capeston Rath – Promentary Fort

Abouth 1,000 tds further down the same stream and on Capeston Farm, is an earthwork similarly situated to that described. There are two defensive but not quite continuous banks. The entrance was at the western end of the banks. visited 31st August 1920

Romans Castle -earthwork

This fine earthwork is in shape a rude paetagon of 200ft north to south and 210ft east to west. There are two banks from 8ft to 12ft high, and a shallow intervening ditch. The entrances in the two banks are not in line – visited 22 July 1920.

Note – On 5th June 1879 there was exhibited to the Archaeological Institute what is described as a short sword said to have been ploughed up at Romans Castle Pembrokeshire. The blade had a length of 11 ins; was double edged to the extent of 5ins, and had a studded and taperering ivory haft 6ins in length; Guard 3 ½ in in length, with a human head at each end. (Arch Journal xxxvi 385)

Howelston Rath

1. An irregular square earthwork having only a single bank and shallow ditch. It has been almost entirely removed on the north and west sides where the entrance would seem to have been places – visited 6th March 1924

Chapel Park

A name still used locally for the second field west of Roman Castle Rath. In the north east corner are the indistinct and grass-grown foundations of a small building which was known as Romans Chapel. It would appear to have been a medieval way-side Chapel, but without clearing away the undergrowth it is impossible to do more than note the Site – visited 22nd July 1920

Meeting House Park

This name is still locally used for the second field west of Syke farm house, and Lower Meeyng house Park and Upper meeting house Park are names attached to two adjacent fields. No place of worship is recorded as having stood here, nor does the surface exhibit signs of foundations. visited 31st August 1920

Warren: A small parish in Pembrokeshire 5 miles SW of Pembroke. Its Church has a tall tower constituting a prominent landMark, but architecturally uninteresting though it preserves a piscina in the S Chapel and an early font. From Warren a road runs south to the coast where the cliff scenery is exceptionally fine. A cliff camp on a promontory encloses a circular chasm (entered at the bottom by the waves through an arch in the face of the cliffs) which is called "The Devil's Punchbowl" and forms a sea cauldron. Off the coast rise two isolated rocks named the Stacks which are the breeding grounds for puffins, guillemots, razor bills and other sea birds. They assemble in thousands at the beginning of May and depart at the end of July. These rocks are really in the parish of Castlemartin.

Acc/to Lewis - A Topographical Dictionary of Wales 1834.

Waren: A parish in the hundred of Castlemartin County of Pembroke 5 miles SW of Pembroke containing 169 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south western part of the county is of considerable extent reaching to the coast of the Bristol Channel by which is bounded on the South and South west. It includes the small village of Lenny, on the western coast from which a point of land, projecting into the sea derives its name of Lenny head. The living is a discharged vicarage in the archdeaconry and diocese of St David's, rated in the King's Books at £4 8s 11/2d., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 Parliamentary Grant and in the patronage of the Bishop of St David's. The Church dedicated to St Mary is an ancient building with a square tower surmounted by a spire of stone forming a conspicuous object on this part the coast. In the Churchyard is the pedestal of an ancient cross, in which is inserted the head of one of the circular kind. According to tradition, there was an ancient religious house on a farm called Warren; but there are no remains of it, and the only records of its existence are the names of several places in the immediate neighbourhood, which would appear to have been derived from such an establishment. Vestiges of an ancient fortification of a circular form and still in good state of preservation may be seen in a field between this place and the parish Church of St Twinnel; it was defended by a triple rampart, having an entrance on the west side, and appears to have been a place of great strength the area within the inner rampart, which is the most entire is about one acre in extent. It appears to have formed a link in a chain of fortifications by which the South west coast were protected from the piratical incursions of the Saxons and the Danes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £123 19s.

Pre Norman:

Phillips suggests that Laws may have found an early Christian burial site on the southern coast not far from Warren (P58)

Laws p57. Edward Laws did excavate what he believed was a large early Christian Cemetery not very far away from the Church with over 200 burials and one special burial which was carefully covered by a large stone slab and among the items found in the grave was a piece of limestone with a celtic cross cut in it. One suggestion was that the cemetery dated to the 2nd Century AD.

He also found what the local labourers described as the ruins of a Chapel standing east and west 16ft by 12ft which it was believed had an east window and a stoup 14in by 8in of red sandstone was also found.

RCAM records:

Brownsnade Tumulus:

This is a much-disturbed sepulchral mound standing in a field called Church-ways belonging to the farm of Brownsnade. It was partially excavated in 1880, when remains of burials of men, women and children were discovered on the south-eastern side, the bodies "packed in tiers" of at least three deep. With the remains were found a piece of fine bronze which might have been an ear-ring, a finger-ring, and a small brass ring with a rude pattern of spots punched on it and also a small stoup, which is now fixed in the wall of Flimston Chapel. Mixed with the human remains were animal bones, a few limpet shells, and a flint flake. A little to the north of this find was disinterred a human skeleton, placed on a roughly-prepared clay surface and surrounded by rough dry masonry; with the body was a horse's nipper, some animal bones and sea shells. In the course of the re-interment of the human remains in the centre of the mound, a cist burial was discovered about 3feet below the surface; the bones were much decayed. In the cist there were some animal bones, a fragment of wheel-turned Pottery, a piece of Chert stone bored for use as a hammer, and a block of red sandstone marked with V shaped lines. In the mound, but perhaps not connected with any of the burials was a flat piece of limestone bearing a roughly incised cross within a circle. Laws - Little England beyond Wales, 57-9, ill.).

Brownsnade Tumulus Finds:

- (a) Wheel-turned Pottery.
- (b) A piece of fine bronze, possibly the remains of a finger ring.
- (c) A small brass ring.
- (d) A socketed pivot-stone, probably that of the door of the closely adjacent ruined Chapel; also a roughly hewn stoup since fixed in Flimston Chapel.
- (e) A piece of chert about the size of half a brick, with a deep hollow on each side - possibly a cresset stone from the Chapel.

(f) A block of red sandstone with indeterminate markings.

(g) A flat piece of limestone with roughly inscribed cross within a circle.

With the exception of the stoup all the above are in Tenby Museum.

Churchways Chapel:

This little edifice stood immediately north of the Brownslade tumulus on one of two fields called Upper and Lower Church Hill (Tithe Schedule, No 376-7). The remains of foundations are now practically buried beneath the sand. When opened up in 1880 the Chapel was found to be "very tiny, being only 16 feet by 12 feet and pitched with water-worn stones". (Laws p57).

Crocksydam Camp

This is a promontary camp defended on three sides by steep cliffs, and on the land side by a convex rampart and ditch. The bank which has a length of 300 ft rises 3 ft and falls 8 ft to a 5 ft ditch. The enclosed area of about one acre is rough and exposed ; the surface shows slight depressions which may be hut circles . The mid -rampart entrance has a width of 10ft . The ends of the bank are strengthened by a few large slabs which appear to occupy their original position. visited 24th May 1922.

Merrion Camp

This earthwork stands immediately north of Merrion Court, on a field called Castle Park. It has greatly suffered of recent years from cultivation

Lt Col W. Ll Morgan R.E. Reports of it in 1889:-

An irregular oval 300ft by 240ft on fairly level ground but slightly falling to the west and south with a narrow gully to the north The main rampart is seldom more than 2 to 3 ft above the interior, with a 9ft fall on the eastern side, where the defences are best preserved; but 12ft overlooking the gully(where the ditch is 3ft deep). Here this first is the only defence.

To the east are three other banks the crests of which are 4ft, 2ft, and 4ft below the the inner rampart. The ditches are on a uniform level with the ground outside, there is here no outer ditch. On the west and south the third bank disappears, and in its place is a level plateau 36ft wide; there is however an outer ditch 2ft deep. As ther is no outer ditch where there is a third bank it is evident that the plateau is intentional and is not due to the distruction of the bank. The entrance is at the north west corner. – visited 24th May 1922.

St Mary Church Warren Parish of Castlemartin.

Restored in 1855 altering its appearance but barrel vaulting in nave and south transept suggests 13c. It has a tower with octagonal steeple.

Church closed - restored - and reopened 1988 by the German Army bases at Castlemartin.

The Church has an unusual plan. The chancel has a north wall in line with the three bay arcade between a wider nave and a north aisle with a squint. Tiny Chapels open off the SW corner of the chancel and SE corner of the nave, and a small gabled tower stands north of the aisle. The whole south side was rebuilt in 1870, in the porch is a tiny figure of a civilian under a canopy. There is a scalloped Late Norman font.

The lofty west tower has lancet belfry windows. The nave, south porch, and south transept are vaulted. They are 13th century but the windows have been renewed. The chancel was rebuilt in 1855. The porch has corbels for the beams of an upper floor.

Pembrokeshire Parsons's

There appears to be no very early mention of this Church, which seems to have always been in the patronage of the Bishop of St Davids as record show that the Warren estate was held by the Bishops from before 1293.

Warren St Mary's August 1851 (before restoration) Arch Camb 1852 Freeman

A peculiar Pembrokeshire style of Church but differing in arrangement materially from Castlemartin. It comprises a chancel, nave, south transept, porch, and a western tower with stone spire. The tower and spire seem to be Third Pointed; the tower large and lofty without strings of division, but with stair turret at the north-west. There is neither buttress nor battlement, but a corbel-table near the top; the west door closed; the basement spreads outwards; the west window Third Pointed, and labelled; the belfry-windows are single, narrow lights and there is another kind of lancet opening on the north. The spire is not lofty in proportion to the tower, is octagonal, but not ribbed. Its only openings are a series of single lights; one in each face round the lower part. The lower part of the tower has within a plain vault and a modern wall has been added between it and the nave, perhaps for additional strength. There appears to have been once an aisle or Chapel on the north. The chancel inclines considerably from the line of the nave to the north. The chancel-arch is a very rude, mis-shapen one, which can hardly be in its original state. To the north of it is an arched recess in the wall, perhaps a hagioscope. There are stone corbels inside the nave, on the north side. Most of the windows are frighfully modernised; but there is a closed lancet at the south-east of the chancel and another at the north-east. The chancel is long and well developed. There was once an aisle or Chapel on the south side opening to it by a pointed arch and by another to the transept. The sacarium is large. There are some stone brackets in it. The nave has rather a desolate look and is pewed.

The font has asquare bowl upon a cylindrical stem which stands on two square steps. The porch has plain, pointed doors

There is a holy well in the churchyard on the west of the tower, and the steps on which once stood a cross on the south.

Parish of Warren:

The Parish Church Dedicated to St Mary 1920

The building consists of chancel (33ft by 16ft) nave (44ft by 18 1/2ft), South Transept (15 3/4ft by 11ft) tower at west end with short spire (19ft by 14ft) and south porch. The structure was restored in 1855 when the windows were renewed and the chancel rebuilt (Arch. Camb. 1856 III ii 331). The chancel arch and that to the south aisle are modern. The nave, south transept, porch and ground stage of the tower have plain barrel vaults of 13c date. In the south east angle of the south transept is a plain aumbry; in the east wall are traces of a blocked window with a pointed arch. Many corbels are still in situ, notably those of the rood screen on the west face of the chancel arch. The tower has a pronounced batter, and is crowned with a corbel table and parapet. The spire has been rebuilt in stone in succession to a former wooden one which had become unsafe. The font basin (26 inches square externally and 21 1/2 inches internally) is perfectly plain, and bears marks of having had a hinged cover. It stands on a circular shaft and square base.

Churchyard Cross: In the churchyard is a restored cross, the shaft and head in one piece; it stands upon a base of three steps. visited 24th May 1922.

The area has been inhabited from early times as the name Longstone (owned partly by Sir Hugh Owen and partly by John Campbell and tenanted by Roger Hitching in 1791) is believed to have contained the site of an old burial mound.

In others the Service of the prayers is but partly Read, and that perhaps but once a month, or perhaps once in a quarter of a year; not is it indeed reasonable to expect that they would be better served while Stipends allow'd for the service of them are so small that a poor Curate must sometimes submit to serve three or four Churches for £10 or £12 a year and that perhaps when they are almost as many miles from each other.

Letter from Bishop Samuel Squire of St David's to Mr Holcombe [his newly appointed Agent] re estates belonging to the Diocese of St David's about which "parts of the lands I have reason to believe, have from time to time, been transferred by fraudulent leasees to other owners without the bishops or their agents knowing anything of the matter".

One of the Estates mentioned was that of Warren Rectory leases to Mr Bar. Blaine in 1751.

Church in Wales MS SD/LET/1827.

1770 November 30. Abr[aha]m Leach to the Rev. Mr Archdeacon [George] Holcombe at Pulcroghan:

Some little time ago I took the liberty of mentioning to you an inconvenience which attended Warren Church and Chancel from a vacant aisle adjoining the body of the Church. On a Fair survey I find that it's not made the least use of by the parishioners and contributes greatly to make the Church very damp, the water in rainy seasons running in streams into the Church through the roof and gutter though its vaulted, the parishioners not attending to the repairs as its not made use of. I made a proposal to the parishioners that if they would give me leave I would pull down the aisle and fill up the arch, which would make the Church more dry and comfortable. They all consented but one, whose only reason is that some of his wife's family were buried there some years past. As the Church is so large and burying ground enough in it for that family, I think his objection very trifling. I therefore beg the favour of you that you would be pleased to represent the matter to the Bishop and beg his indulgence to take down the aisle. You will please to mention to the Bishop that my father is tenant to his lordship for the tithes of Warren and has the care of the repairs of the chancel in him in consequence of it. (Lucas MS 1062).

1786 Land Tax returns: Henry Leach paid £4 on the Great Tithe of Warren; he died the next year age 87. [Pembrokeshire Historian no7 Page 38 has much information on Leach's family and yeoman stock in the Castlemartin area]. Henry made his Fortune as a Merchant in Pembroke then invested in property; acquired Corston and also had investments in Mining. It was Henry's son Abraham who wrote the letter above and who took over his fathers business interests and increased the family Fortune substantially.

Restored in 1855 altering the Church's appearance.

1855, 6, 7. Restored at cost of Lord Cawder by David Brandon architect London. James Rogers of Tenby contractor cost £629 + £82 for Minton Tiles. (Carmarthen PRO Cawder Box 223 & 140).

Letter from David Brandon to Lord Cawder "When I examined the stonework of the spire, I found it much more decayed than anticipated. All the external face had crumbled, particularly on the Southwest side due to the vegetation covering it. It lets water through into the Church. It cannot be repaired and must either be rebuilt or cased in Forest of Dean stone 5 to 6 inches thick".

(Letter CRO Cawder Box 140).

1922 the stained glass window in the transept "erected 60 years ago by General Leach?" was removed by the family and another one substituted in its place. The old one was "never satisfactory to the family" and was destroyed.

In 1986 the Warren Church Trust was formed as it was realised that there was a need for a place of worship for the many troops who visited the Castlemartin R.A.C. Range. The British and German Forces based at the Castlemartin R.A.C. Range, part of the parish, arranged the funding of the complete restoration which included a new roof. The architects being Michell & Holden, Pembroke. Unfortunately on the 25th January 1990, during a hurricane with winds gusting up to 112 mph, the recently restored roof was blown off, and had to be replaced.

From article by Rev. Hill in Link Up:

Warren Church has a much travelled Organ. Built in 1842, it is reputed to have originally belonged to Felix Mendelssohn (1809 - 1857). It was then moved to the Church at Sibton Suffolk. In 1867 it was bought by F. & E. Mirehouse for St Mary's Church Angle. 20 years later it was moved from Angle to St Michael's Castlemartin where it remained until 1988. The Organ underwent a major restoration in 1916, paid for by Cecil Elinor Lambton as a memorial to her grandmother, Mary Levett, the daughter of John Mirehouse of Angle and Brownsnade. By 1988 it was again in need of restoration, and by a happy inspiration was included in the restoration work at Warren.

Loveling - 4 generations of Vicars same parish

Loveling William 1613 was the first of four members of the same family who served this Church as vicars over a period of one hundred and forty seven years Is there any other Church that can say the same

William only was vicar for 16 years and was succeeded by his son

Loveling Mathias (Mathew) 1629 who also held the living of Castlemartin as did many of the succeeding vicars Mathias although had problems because he was turned out of the benefice for insufficiency by the Commissioners for Propagation in 1650 and the profit's what they were sequestered a successor was not appointed He seems to have regained the living in 1662 when many puritain ministers left their livings rather than give assent to the rites and rituals of the Church under the Act of Uniformity

The Land Tax Records give us a picture of the size of the parish at that time of thirty households ten were classed as paupers and only six had more than one hearth the biggest house in the area has occupied by Thomas , Gough and had five hearths not very big when compared to some of the houses in other parishes

Mathias Loveling 1671 died in 1671 and was succeeded by his son

Loveling William 1718 during his time Erasmus Saunders described the living of Warren as one of the poorest in the area and says of the churches generally in the area that there were many which "we are but rarely if at all to meet with Preaching Catechising or Administering of the Holy Communion In others the Services of the prayers is but partly Read, and that perhaps but once a month or perhaps once in a quarter of a year " Curates were submitted to serve three of four churches very often ten of twelve miles from one another for an annual stipend of 10pounds William was in 1718 followed by his son

Miniature Tower House near St Florence equipped with fireplaces and chimneys upper floor supported by stone barrel vaulted undercroft.

West Williamston

West Williamston. One of the great limestone quarrying centres of the past century. Look at the O.S.1:50,000 map gives a vivid impression of the extent of the workings and of the "Locks" used by barges to load up with limestone blocks and rubble. At the turn of the century the quarries employed 150 men, and limestone from here was used for the building of Pembroke Dockyard. Now the village has declined greatly having lost its Church, its pubs and its quarrymen. There is an Oiled Bird Centre in one of the farm buildings, managed by members of the West Wales Naturalists' Trust.

Whitchurch, see also Solva

Whitchurch, located 1 ¼ miles from the coast and east of St David's, includes the parish Church dedicated to Saint David but only a few houses. The main settlement in is Solva, whose own Church is dedicated to St Aidan.

1870-72, John Marius Wilson's Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales

WHITCHURCH, a parish in Haverfordwest district, Pembroke; on St. Brides bay, 3 miles E by S of St Davids, and 12½ WNW of Haverfordwest railway station. It contains Solva village, which has a post-office under Haverfordwest. Acres, 3,138. Real property, £3,159. Pop. in 1851, 1,252; in 1861, 1,085. Houses, 284. The property is much subdivided. The living is a vicarage in the diocese of St Davids. Value, £101. Patrons, the Bishop and Chapter of St. Davids. The Church was reported in 1859 as bad. There are three dissenting Chapels, and charities £6.

1839 Whitchurch Topographical Dictionary of Wales Lewis

WHITCHURCH, a parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dewisland, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 12 miles (N. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest; containing 1120 inhabitants. This parish, which contains the small sea-port town of Solva, described under its own head, is situated upon the coast of St. St Bride's Bay, and on the turnpike-road from Haverfordwest to St Davids. It comprises 3200 acres, of which 400 are common or waste land; the surface is abruptly varied, and the scenery being diversified with Hill and Dale, is in some parts, especially near the town, highly picturesque. The inhabitants are employed in agriculture; in the burning of lime, for which there are some kilns near the entrance of the town of Solva; and in the trade of the port. The living is a discharged vicarage, rated in the King's Books at £5. 15. 7½., and endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant: the tithes have been commuted for £292, of which a sum of £146. 13. 4. is payable to the Dean and Chapter of St Davids Cathedral, who are patrons of the benefice, £48 to the Subchanter and Vicars-choral, and £97. 6. 8. to the vicar. The Church, dedicated to St David, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. In the town and parish are places of worship for Baptists, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Independents; a disused schoolroom licensed as a Chapel of ease; a British school, and six Sunday schools. Caervoriog, in the parish, was the birthplace of Adam Hoton, Bishop of St Davids, at one time ambassador to the Court of France, and Lord High Chancellor of England.

The State of Education in Wales 1847

An agricultural parish, labourers receive 1s 2d a day on their own finding and 10d a day with food. The moral behaviour is not good. A good deal of low cunning and falsehood prevail. There is a resident Clergyman but no resident land proprietor. Gilbert Harries esq. Llanymaes contributed £5 per annum when the school was opened, and would still if there was a competent master

Pembrokeshire Parsons Whitchurch in Dewisland

The vicarage of Whitchurch appears to have belonged to the chapter of St David's Cathedral as far back, at all events, as the year 1402, and has remained in the patronage of the chapter down to the present date.

Described as Ecclesia Albi Monasterii, this Church was in 1291 assessed at £6 13s 4d. for tenths for the King, the sum payable being 13s. 4d. - Taxatio.

There is very little on record about the Church. It appears from a report of the case of Meyler v. Bright which was tried at Hereford in 1829, that the roof of the Church had some years previously fallen in, and had also been repaired before that date, and that a stone seat ran round the sides of the aisles. - Felix Farley's Bristol Journal for 29 Aug., 1829.

The rectorial tithes of Whitchurch have from the year 1711 been included in the lease of the St David's tithes. The vicarage of Whitchurch was united to the rectory of St. Elvis by an Order in Council dated 15 Jan., 1842.

Presentations to the vicarage of Whitchurch were made by the precentor and chapter of St David's Cathedral

Whitchurch--St David's Glynne October 28th 1870

A very small mean Church, having single nave and chancel undistinguished, with a south porch and wooden belfry over the west end. The windows are all modern insertions, and there is little of the original architecture to be seen. Near the east end, on the north, is a small slit like opening. The porch is of wooden framework, rude and characteristic; the doorway within it pointed and continuous. The tie remains over where was once the rood loft. The font has a circular bowl on stem of like form, apparently ancient.

situated within a rectilinear churchyard, bounded by roads on its north and west sides. Historic Ordnance Survey mapping depicts a square churchyard, whose western boundary did not extend as far as the road. It also depicts a standing stone some 20m north (across the road) of the Church building. The Church was a parish Church in the medieval period, and was first noted in documents of 1291, when it was belonged to the Cistercian order.

The Church is a Grade II listed building, constructed of rubble stone with purple Caerbwdy stone dressings. It consists of Nave, chancel, north Chapel (with canted passage between Chapel and north wall) and bellcote. The octagonal font is medieval (on a nineteenth century base). A wall plaque dates to 1771. The Church was heavily restored in 1872-1874, to the designs of C.E. Buckeridge. The Chapel roof is nineteenth century in date, as is the pulpit. All openings are nineteenth century in date and framed in purple stone. The east stained glass window dates to 1903. Cadw, Listed Building Database N Vousden, RCAHMW, 2 October 2013

Whitechurch

Whitechurch or Eglwys Wen 1839 Lewis

Whitechurch, or EGLWYS-WEN, a parish, in the union of Cardigan, hundred of Kemmes, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Cardigan; containing 395 inhabitants. This parish is supposed to have derived its name from the White colour of the stone of which the original Church was built. It is situated in a retired part of the county, at a distance from any turnpikeroad, and comprises a considerable tract of inclosed arable and grazing land, a portion of mountainous common affording pasturage for sheep, and some good turbaries, from which the inhabitants are supplied with fuel. The total area is 2481 acres; the soil is various, and the population is principally employed in agriculture. The stone in this part of the country contains a great proportion of quartz, which is found in abundance within the parish. Whitechurch is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £6, and endowed with £200 royal bounty; patron, Thomas Lloyd, esq.: the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £140. The Church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents; a British school, and two Sunday schools. John Jones, of Pantyderri, in 1729, bequeathed rent-charges of £1 and ten shillings respectively, to the poor of this parish and that of Llanvair Nantgwyn adjacent; with other small charges to a few contiguous places.

1870-72, John Marius Wilson's Imperial Gazetteer of England and Wales described Whitechurch like this:

Whitechurch, or Eglwys-Wen, a parish in the district of Cardigan and county of Pembroke; 6½ miles SSW of Cardigan r. station. Post town, Cardigan. Acres, 2,481. Real property, £1,589. Pop., 318. Houses, 70. The property is much subdivided. The living is a rectory in the diocese of St Davids. Value, £113. Patron, T. Lloyd, esq.. The Church is bad.

1895 Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmins

We now approach the confines of the parish of Eglwys-wen, or Whitechurch; a parish where adders are commonly reputed to be, like snakes in Iceland, absolutely unknown.

There is a curious tradition antenna the yokels of Whitechurch parish. Says our trusty friend George Owen, 'In ancient times in this parish the MeaNest and simplest Sort of people, yea the plain plough-men, were skillful at chess play; they never being dwelling out of their Parish, but unletterate, and brought up at the plough and harrow altogether.' One would be curious to learn how it came to pass that these simple folk, dwelling in this remote Welsh parish, acquired such an unlooked-for reputation.

1872 Church St Michael

The Church was erected in 1872, but not on the old foundations; it is somewhat smaller than the earlier structure which had fallen into ruins. In the porch is a stone inscribed "1591" and it is stated in Pem Arch Survey that on its concealed side in the date "1674" visited 22nd September 1914.

There is no resident Clergy. It is an agricultural parish with labourers receiving 6d to 8d a day with food and 1s a day on their own finding. There are four resident land proprietor Many of the population cannot read or write.

Parish of Whitechurch Penygroes British School On the 29th of January I visited the above school. It was held in a room over the stable belonging to the Independent Chapel. The room was well lighted by three glazed windows. It contained a fireplace , parallel desks and benches and a desk for the master. The school at the time of my visit, was kept by the minister, who was only acting as locum tenens while the proper master was studying at the Brecon Normal School, which he had been doing since November. I heard a class of twelve read to the master – four only could read with ease. I asked the master to question them in his usual way. The only way in which he questioned them was by putting each verse verbatim into an interrogative form. Simple arithmetical questions were very readily worked both on slates and mentally. Grammar they knew little.

David Lewis Assistant

Penygroes Sunday School This school is held in the Independent Chapel, and in the schoolroom belonging to the same congregation which is built on a part of the burying ground, above the stable. The Testament classes are in the former, and the junior of elementary classes, with one class of adults reading the New Testament, in the latter. The school commenced this afternoon at 2 o'clock by the superintendent desiring one of the teacher to hear two females apparently about 23 years of age repeat the first chapter of the book of Joshua, which they did very correctly. A hymn was then sung and the teacher delivered a prayer. The secretary then called the names of the teachers and everyone answered "Here I am". The teachers then went to their different classes. In the schoolroom I saw one little boy in the alphabet, one class in the second class book of the London Sunday school union and two classes in the third Class book. The different teachers had printed questions from which they questioned the scholars as soon as the lessons were read correctly. Some of them were taught individually, others collectively. The adult class in the school room was reading the tenth chapter of Hebrews and answering questions put by the teacher.

There was only one female teacher in the school and she was as expert in proposing questions as the male teachers. At a quarter to four the superintendent ordered the books to be taken up; the anthem , "worthy is the Lamb" was sung by 20 to 30 of the teachers and scholars; and Mr David James of Pantgafel, concluded the school with prayer.

I was informed that the teachers and scholars were freeholders, farmers , servants, labourers and their children; but the major portion of the scholars were adults.

This is a school of considerable reputation

Moel Trigarn

[Roman Coin Found]

According to Lieut Col W Ll Morgan R. E. F. S.A. a retired Commissioner.

Situated on one of the eastern spurs of Prescelly 1200ft above the sea in a position unusually bleak and exposed. The stone used in its construction is of the ordinary Pembrokeshire trap, detached fragments of the disintegrated outcrop are lying about in large masses. The defences consist of two ramparts encircling the summit, with an outwork to the east. The inner enclosure is oval in shape, 500 ft by 400ft, and contains an area of 5 ¾ acres. The outer 40 yds down the Hill contains 8 ½ acres, and the outwork 2 acres. The rampart of the inner enclosure is traceable all round except on 4105

the southern side, where the steep slope is covered with a talus of stone and fallen rocks; here all trace of the rampart have disappeared. It is 10 to 15ft wide at the base and was formed by cutting a terrace in the slope of the Hill and throwing the earth backwards to form a bank which was faced internally and externally with rough stones, at present from 1 ½ to 3 ft above the turf, with unusually deep foundations, probably due to the accumulation of the soil; but in places where it would have been difficult to cut this terrace, a stone wall with a base of 8ft 6in was built with faces to both sides, and long headers freely used; when these difficulties were passed the bank again appears.

Within the enclosure are the traces of at least 100 habitations, formed by cutting into the hillside and throwing the earth forward. There are no signs of walling. The rampart surrounding the second enclosure is not so well preserved as the inner one. In many places it disappears in the clatter. On the eastern side it has been much mutilated by farmers extracting long stone for building purposes. On the western side it is untraceable in the loose stones; to the north west and north it appears as a stone wall 8ft 6in thick at the base, but soon changes to an earthen bank faced with stone, reverting to a stone wall on the eastern side where it is in a very ruinous condition. All traces are now lost in the clatter until, on the southern side near the entrance, it again appears as a stone wall. In this enclosure are about 120 sites of dwellings; they are more numerous to the south.

The rampart of the outwork is in a more ruinous condition than others, and would appear to have been of the wall type, the only portions distinctly faced is to the north. The interior is covered with hut sites, but they are not so distinct as in the other enclosures.

There are three entrances, all straight cuts through the sides. The eastern or principal is through the three enclosures, but by no means in a direct line. It entered the out work near its south west corner, passed through the eastern side of the outer enclosure 50 yds to the north, and the inner enclosure 40 yds to the southwest. This entrance is the only one well defined, and is about 12 ft wide. The western entrance of the inner enclosure is fairly traceable, but the southern is very doubtful. through all the camp there is no sign of a ditch. There are three cairns within the enclosure near the summit of the Hill; they have been much disturbed and nothing can be learned from them

The camp was excavated in 1899 by the Rev S Baring Gould and Mr Barnard.

The finds consist of fragments of iron much oxidised, associated with spindle whorls, pounders of stone, sling stones, glass beads, portions of armlet rings and stone lamps, which were, in the opinion of the excavators of the time of the Iron Age; probably 700BC to 100 AD. -The finds are deposited in Tenby Museum. --visited 22nd September 1914----- Since then a Roman coin, a "first brass" of the empress Faustina (d 175ad) was found – It is now in the National Museum of Wales.

Wiston or Wizton

Roman

2003 from an air survey, a Roman road was reported to pass just north of village. The road originates from the major Roman town of Carmarthen, known as Moridunum during the Roman period. The destination of the road is uncertain and has only been traced beyond Wiston for a mile or two.

2013 it was confirmed that about 500m north-east of Wiston near Churchill Farm, is located the first ever Roman fort discovered in Pembrokeshire. The site was believed previously, according to the Ordnance Survey Map, to be a quarry

This is a significant discovery that shows the Romans did indeed travel into Pembrokeshire. Dating appears to indicate that the fort is 1st century with possible 2nd century occupation. It remains to be seen whether there are further forts to the west, possibly at St David's.

Wiston, Possible Roman Fort

Church Hill quarry, located approx. 550m north-east of Wiston is shown on the Ordnance Survey county series mapping as a U-shaped quarry approx 170m length. It is situated approx 650m South East of Wiston Castle

Photographed during aerial reconnaissance by RCAHMW on 29th Nov 2007.

Further earthwork features revealed with Lidar analysis by Bryn Gethin in 2010 has revealed the continuation of the north and south ditches and a ditch to the west, leading to the possibility of a Roman Fort.

Possible Roman Fort, Wiston, Pembrokeshire:

Geophysical Survey 2012 summary

A possible Roman Fort has previously been suggested at this site (SN 026 187), near Wiston in Pembrokeshire, due to the presence of a large U-shaped ditch or hollow approximately 35m wide and 140m long with two perpendicular arms, and its location close to the remains of a Roman road. The wide nature of the ditch/hollow, the fact that the site is labelled 'Old Quarry' on the Ordnance 4107

Survey maps and the shape of the site meant that the Roman fort interpretation has been dismissed in the past. However, recent Lidar data shows the arms of the ditch continuing further to the west than is shown on maps and aerial photographs, and that they may turn to form a rectangular enclosure with a possible entrance on the south side facing the Roman road.

Cadw commissioned Dyfed Archaeological Trust to undertake the geophysical survey of the site in the hope of identifying and characterising possible buried Archaeological remains and determining if this is the site of a Roman fort.

The fieldwork was undertaken in July 2012. The geophysical survey revealed a complex range of Archaeological activity. Throughout the surveyed area, these included features characteristic of the remains of a Roman Fort, namely the shape and size of the site along with its distinctive defensive ditches and possible central entranceway's. These features appear convincing enough to confirm this as the site of a Roman fort.

This report has been prepared by Philip Poucher : Archaeologist

Date 18/02/2013

We can confirm that we have a Roman Fort, the first in Pembrokeshire. It seems to have had a typical fort layout.

It was surrounded by three large ditches, inside of which was an earth rampart.

A substantially made intervallum road ran around the inside of the fort with buildings on either side. Postholes of timber structures indicate different phases of building within the fort.

In its centre lie the remains of the Principia surviving in the form of a courtyard surface and possible postholes.

The fort is likely to be of 1st century AD date from Pottery recovered.

A later ditched enclosure lies within the centre of the fort, which at this stage looks to be second century AD in date, although its function is unclear.

1811 Wiston Fenton (Tours)

Hence I proceeded to Wiston, or rather Wiztown, the ancient seat of the Wogans, a family, though originally transplanted from another part of Wales, once of the first note in this county with regard to the depth of its root and the extent of its ramification, but now totally extinct since the death of the late co-heiresses of that house within these few years.

Wiston, in Welsh Castell Gwys, the head of the barony of Daugleddau, so called from occupying that tract of land between, the both River Cleddaus, was granted to a powerful Norman, or Fleming of the name Wiz, the daughter and heiress or whose grandson, Sir Philp Gwys, married Gwgan ap

Bleddyn a descendant of Caradog Vreichvras, Knight of the round Table to King Arthur, the first who settled in Pembrokeshire, and laid the foundation of the family of Wogan, whose posterity became men of great eminence as well in this county as in Ireland; the latter of which Sir John Wogan was Chief Justice in the time of Edward the first, at the same time styling himself Lord of Pyketown.

The Castle, from its situation on a commanding eminence, and as a Barrier fortress of the new settlers, was undoubtedly of great extent and strength, though very little more than a truncated ruin of the keep now remains, Yet there is every reason to suppose that part of the present mansion of Wiston, by the thickness of its walls, and by an old gateway still standing, was a relic of the old Castle, only from time to time rendered more modern and better accommodated to the improved taste of its later inhabitants.

It suffered frequently from the constant wars between the Welsh princes and its first proprietors , was repeatedly razed to the ground and as often repaired.

The first mention that is made of it in the Welsh Chronicle is AD 1146, when Cadell, Meredith, and Rhys, sons of Gruffydd ap Rhys ap Tewdur, brought an army before it, who with the assistance of Howel, son of Owen Gwynedd celebrated for his valour and military skill, having had recourse to battering engines and others, for throwing stones into the Castle, such was the strength of the fortifications, caused it after an obstinate siege , to surrender.

The next account we have of it is its being surprised by Howel Says, one of Lord Rhys's sons, who made Philip de Gwys with his wife and two sons, prisoners of war, which happened in the year 1193.

In the year 1220, Llewhellin, who , at the intercession of Jorwerth Bishop of St David's had concluded a peace with the Flemings , on condition that they should in future swear allegiance to him, and acknowledge his sovereignty, irritated by the violation of the treaty, razed the Castle of Gwys, putting the garrison to the sword.

It was about this time that Gwgan first made his appearance in this county, who, after the death of the late Philips sons, probably among the late victims to LLewhellins resentment, married the daughter Gwenllian, or as some pedigrees have it Margaret, now became sole heiress to her father. From this period, on consequence probably of a native Welshman in the person of Gwgan, getting into possession of the Castle by means of such alliance, and espousing the interest of his rightful sovereign , we never hear of it being attacked or besieged , and after it had been sacked by Llewhellin, it was not restored to its former state of extent or strength.

Wiston on the name of Wogan becoming extinct, was, with its finely circumstanced estate, and borough contributory to Pembroke, sold to Lord Cawder. The borough is prescriptive, without stint, and governed by a mayor, and in confirmation of its rights and privileges, in the year 1712 Feb 23, it was resolved in the House of Commons, that the mayor and burgesses of the ancient borough of Wiston, in the county of Pembroke, have a right to vote in the elections for the borough of Pembroke..

The mansion is a large but awkward pile, as must ever be the case when you add new buildings to old, and endeavour to unite and assimilate the architecture of different eras. From the most modern side of the house, including the principal front, you have an extensive prospect of the finest part of the county round Milford Haven to the south, as you have likewise of the mountains to the north from the ruined keep of the Castle. I understand there is a sketch of the Castle of Wiston, by Buck never published among Mr Gough's collections, now forming a valuable accession to the Bodleian library, but I apprehend exhibiting very little more of its ancient state than what meets the eye at this day, which is very inconsiderable, having been told by the oldest people of the neighbourhood that the ruins have made the same appearance for near a century.

The Church, like most of its Norman neighbours, is marked by a small tower, and is a donative belonging to Wiston.

1839 Topographical Dictionary of Wales --Lewis

Wiston, or WIZTON, a borough and parish, in the union of Haverfordwest, hundred of Dungledy, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 5 miles from Haverfordwest, 15 from Pembroke, and 259½ from London; containing 775 inhabitants. This place, the Welsh name of which is Castell Gwys, derived that appellation from its earliest Norman or Flemish possessor, Gwys, or Wiz, who constituted it the head of his barony of Daugleddau. The daughter of his grandson Sir Philip Gwys, married Gwrgan ab Bleddyn, a native chieftain, from whom descended the family of Wogan, in whose possession the place remained till the present century, when, in default of male issue, the ample estates of this ancient family were divided among the coheirresses; and the Castle and borough of Wiston were subsequently purchased by Earl Cawdor. The Castle, founded by the original Norman proprietor, and a place of great strength, was frequently connected with the military events of which the ancient province of Pembroke was the scene, in the continual conflicts between the Welsh and the Norman invaders of their country. In 1146 the three sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, joined by Hywel ab Owain Gwynedd, having assaulted the fortress with stones thrown by machines invented for that purpose, and with battering-rams, succeeded, after an obstinate defence, in gaining possession of it. In 1193 it was attacked by Hywel ab Rhys, who took Philip de Gwys and his wife prisoners, and carried them off; and in 1220, Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, in resentment of the violation of a treaty by which the settlers in this part of the country had sworn allegiance to him, attacked the Castle, which he razed to the ground, and put the garrison to the sword. From this time the fortress never recovered its former strength, which, indeed, became unnecessary, as the Welsh, after the marriage of their countryman Gwrgan with the daughter of Philip de Gwys, appear to have left this chieftain and his family in the undisturbed possession of the place.

The parish lies a short distance north of the main road from Narberth to Haverfordwest, and is of very considerable extent: the land is generally poor; the chief portion of tolerably good soil is about 600 acres near the Church. The houses are scattered throughout, scarcely any where forming a group: a few in the vicinity of the Church approach nearest to the character of a village; and one of these is the old manor-house of the Wogans, a part of which, and the only part now occupied, is inhabited as a farmhouse. A Market formerly held here has long been discontinued; but a fair still occurs annually on October 20th.

This place, which is supposed to have been once the county town, appears to be a borough by prescription, for no vestige or notice of any charter is now preserved. A mayor is still elected annually, being presented by the jury of the court leet of the manor and borough, which must consist of burgesses and suitors of the manor; but he is usually some poor man who is appointed as a method of conferring relief, he being entitled to the tolls of the Fair, amounting to £8, £10, or £12 per annum. For a year after the mayor has vacated his office he bears the title of Alderman, and there is a tradition that the borough had once a more permanently constituted aldermanic body. There is still a town clerk. The burgesses are presented by the jury of the court leet, which is held once or twice a year, and in which the only business connected with the borough consists in the appointment and swearing in of the mayor, burgesses, and constables. The constables act only for the parish of Wiston, and this circumstance tends to show that the borough is co-extensive with its limits, which is the more general opinion; some, however, consider that the borough is as large as the manor, which not only comprehends the whole parish, but extends a distance of two miles and a half to the north, and a quarter of a mile to the south, of its boundary. Wiston was formerly contributory with Pembroke and Tenby only, in the return of a parliamentary representative, and the right of election was vested in all the burgesses, resident and non-resident, in whom it was confirmed by a resolution of the House of Commons, in 1712. Under the act of 1832, Milford was added to the district of boroughs, and the right of voting was restricted to the resident portion of the old burgesses, and extended to the £10 holders, duly registered: the number of qualifying tenements is fifty-eight, of which eight are of the value of £10 per annum exclusively of the land held with them.

The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty; net income, £164; patron, Earl Cawdor: the tithes have been commuted for £360, of which a sum of £275 is paid to his lordship, and £85 to the perpetual curate. The Church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain Norman edifice, with a small tower, and, from its retired position in the bosom of a plantation, by which it is partly concealed, has a pleasing and picturesque appearance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists; a day school, in connexion with the Established Church; and two Sunday schools, belonging to the dissenters. The remains of the ancient Castle, occupying an elevated site, are very inconsiderable, consisting chiefly of a portion of the keep, on the summit of a conical Hill, surrounded by a deep moat. From the appearance of the site, the Castle seems to have been originally of great extent; and from the thickness of the walls in some parts of the family mansion of the Wogans, which, according to tradition, formed part of the ancient fortress, it must have been a place of great strength. The mansion of the Wogans is at present let to a farmer, who, however, as already noticed, occupies only part of it: from its windows and from the ruined keep of the Castle are obtained prospects of remarkable extent and beauty.

described Wiston like this:

Wiston, a small town and a parish in Haverfordwest district, Pembroke. The town stands 2¼ miles South South East of Clarbeston-road railway station, and 5½ North East of Haverfordwest; was originally called GWyston or Gwiston; took that name from a Castle, built by Sir P. Gwys, the Norman; was attacked by the Welsh in 1146 and 1193; passed to Gwgan-ap-Bleddyn and to the Wogans; is a borough, governed nominally by a mayor; unites with Pembroke, Milford and Tenby, in sending a member to parliament; and has a post-office under Narberth, and a Fair on 8 Nov. Acres of the borough, 7,030. Real property, £3,374. Pop., 713. Houses, 144.—The parish is conterminous with the borough. The manor belongs to the Earl of Cawdor. The living is a vicarage in the diocese of St Davids. Value, £164. Patron, the Earl of Cawdor. The Church was restored in 1865.

Nooks And Corners Of Pembrokeshire Timmins 1895

Some three miles to the northward of Slebech lies the obscure hamlet of Wiston ; a place so small and insignificant, that it is by no means easy to picture it as the erstwhile head of the barony of Dau-gleddau, a borough town, and the home of the powerful Wogans.

Wiston, we are told, derives its name from a certain Wiz, or Wyzo, a Flemish immigrant of considerable influence, who built a Castle here to protect the infant settlement ; of this Castle a portion of the keep or donjon-tower, and a ruined gateway, still remain in tolerable repair. After having been more than once beleaguered and destroyed, the place was dismantled and deserted at an early period ; so that Wiston Castle plays but a minor part in the records of border warfare.

Of the Wogan family, who for many generations made Wiston their home, the most famous scion was Sir John of that ilk, who was Lord Chief Justice of England in the reign of Edward I. This Sir John, it may be noted en passant, took to himself the style and title of ' Lord of Pyketown.'

1115-47 Castle and Church first documented in the period 1115 - 47 but Wizo died before 1130. Weekly Market discontinued by George Owen's time but the yearly Fair was still held.

1710. Mayor and burgesses petitioned Parliament emphasising that their town was an ancient borough.

Wiston Church. Arch Camb 1898

Wiston Church was carefully and minutely described by the Rev. R. Henry Jones, the vicar. The stones paving the avenue of lime trees were the remains of a stone pathway which led from the Manor House to the Church, and were said to have been laid by members of the Wogan family. The Church contains two holy-water stoups and aumbry. The tower is probably Edwardian, and there are indications of an entrance into the tower from the nave, thus showing that the tower was designed for defensive purposes.

Circa 1145, Wizo the Fleming, with the subsequent approval of his sons Walter and Philip, and his grandson Walter, son of the aforesaid Walter, gave to the Hospitallers the Church of St. Mary of the Castle of Wizo.

This was one of the gifts contested by the Prior of Worcester in the well-known law suit.

David, Bishop of St Davids (1147-76), as also Bishop Anselm, in 1230, confirmed the gift to the Hospitallers.

Wiston St Mary . Church

Situated opposite the Castle site is a typical Little England Church, extensively restored in 1864. The nave is 13th century but has Victorian windows. The chancel arch and blocked south doorway are pointed but the north doorway is round headed. The long chancel with rough cast walls may be later. The west tower is 14th century. The vaulted north porch with an ogival outer arch and a basin on each side is early 13th century.

Described as 'Ecclesia Sanctse Atari e de Castro Wiz,' this Church was granted by Wizo, Lord of Wiston, his son Walter, and Walter the son of the said Walter, to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. - Anselm's Confirm. charter.

1535 On the dissolution of the preceptory of Slebech, the advowson came into the hands of the Crown, and subsequently it appears to have been acquired by the Wogans of Wiston.

1662 About the time of the Restoration, a belief seems to have existed that the advowson was owned by Thomas Wogan of Wiston, the Regicide, as a warrant was issued on 15 September., 1662, for a grant to the bishops of London and Winchester, Sir Robert Hyde and Dr. William Thomas, of the rectory, tithes, &c., of Wiston, co. Pembroke, 'lately belonging to Thomas Wogan, attainted of high treason, in trust for the maintenance of a minister there, if requisite, or of ministers in and about London or elsewhere.' - State Papers

1663 Presumably this grant was never proceeded with, as the same records state that in May 1663 a grant was made to Col. Robert Werden and Charles Parker, of the estate, manor, and rectory of Wiston, and barony of Dungledy, co. Pembroke, forfeited by the attainder of Thomas Wogan. If Thomas Wogan did own the property it seems most probable that the latter grant took effect, and that the purchase by Werden and Parker was made either on behalf of the Wogan family or else that the Wogans acquired the interest of the grantees therein.

1664 It seems however much more likely that Thomas Wogan did not own either the Wiston estate or the advowson of the Church, because although Thomas Wogan was evidently alive in 1664 - a proclamation having been issued on 27 July in that year (State Papers) for his apprehension, he, having with others escaped from the Tower of London -

1662 we find that his nephew Henry Wogan by his will dated 7 Feb., 1662, and proved in London on 9 Feb., 1662, devised all his lands in Wiston, with all rents and tithes belonging to the rectory thereof, to his wife and his mother for their lives, with remainder to his uncle Rowland Wogan. - I Laud, fol. 30.

1794 In any event the advowson continued in the hands of the Wogans of Wiston until 15 September., 1794, when Minor (wife of Thomas Roberts of Haverfordwest) and Susan Wogan (the two coheiresses of John Wogan of Wiston, the last male of his line) entered into an agreement for the sale of the rectory and estate of Wiston, to John Campbell of Stackpole Court, Pems., esq..

Wiston Methodist Chapel was built in 1813, modified in 1867, rebuilt in 1873 and renovated in 1911. A porch was added in 1948. The present Chapel, dated 1911, is built in the Simple round-

Penuel Methodist Chapel in Clarbeston road was initially built in 1886 in the Vernacular and Arts and Craft style with a gable-entry plan and large pane flat-headed windows. This Chapel was converted for other use during the mid twentieth century. RCAHMW, November 2010

Carmel Baptist Chapel was built in 1804, rebuilt in 1869 and rebuilt again in 1874. The present Chapel, dated 1874, is built in the Simple round-Headed style with a gable-entry plan. RCAHMW, October 2010

Wiston Castle.Arch Camb 1898

Mr. Edward Laws described the Castle. He said Wiston Castle had been probably the scene of more bloodshed than any other place in the county. It was recorded that it had been burnt, recaptured and burnt, several times in succession. It was, no doubt, originally a mound of some sort upon which a wooden fortress was built, succeeded by a circular stone castelet, portions of which now remained.

1146 Gruffudd ap Rhys assaulted the Castle unsuccessfully.

1189 (the year after the visit of Archbishop Baldwin in company with Gerald the Welshman) it was beseiged by Maelgwyn ap Rhys, but the defenders held out.

1193 Hywel ap Rhys took the Castle from the English.

1220 Llewelyn ap Iorwerth destroyed the Castle.

The Castle was founded by a Fleming or Norman named Wiz, and afterwards became the home of the Wogans, whose names figure largely in the history of Pembrokeshire.

Wiston remained for many hundred years in the possession of the Wogans, and on the name becoming extinct, was sold, with its borough contributory to Pembroke, to the Earl of Cawdor. " The borough is prescriptive, without stint, and governed by a Mayor, and in confirmation of its rights and privileges, in the year 1712, February 23, it was resolved in the House of Commons, that the Mayor and burgesses of the ancient borough of Wiston have a right to vote in the election for the borough of Pembroke."

In the Cartulary of St. Peter's, Gloucester, are ten deeds relating to Wiston, or, as it is there called, Dugledi. From them we gather that Wyzo Flandrensis gave to the abbot and convent of Gloucester the Church of Dugledi, " et omnes ecclesias et capellas terre suae, decimas et beneficia," etc. But his son Walter, on the death of Wyz, seems to have attempted to ignore his father's pious bequests to Gloucester, in consequence of which the King (Henry I) was called upon to interfere.

Wiston Castle RCAM

The existing remains comprise a mound crowned by the ruins of a stone keep which was surrounded by a Bailey. The mound rises to a height of some 40ft with a base circumference of about 550ft. The summit is level 45 to 50ft in diameter. The masonry shows walls from 3ft to 4ft in height and the jambs of a portal having a width of 5ft. Surrounding the mound is a well preserved ditch 10ft in depth. The Bailey is in form an oblong protected by a 4ft rampart and a 3ft ditch; its length from north to south is 450ft and from east to west 550 ft. The Bailey court is locally known as "the Conegar" . The house to the east of the Bailey has succeeded the manor house which took the place of the Castle. The whole site should receive careful excavation –visited 27th July 1915.

Wiston Castle RCAHMW

Wiston Castle is initially mentioned in 1147 and was reported as destroyed in 1220. The surviving remains include an oval banked and ditched enclosure, about 130m east-west by 90m, with a roughly 50m diameter, 7.0m high ditched motte, crowned by the ruins of a shell keep. The keep cuts through, or overlies, the circuit on the north. Consolidation of the motte in 1994 involved limited excavation (Murphy 1997).

An earlier origin has been suggested for the enclosure (CADW guide) and excavations about 100m to the south-west produced some Romano-British material.

Murphy, Archaeology Cambrensis, 144 (1995), 71-102. RCAHMW,

An Anglo-Norman power base: Wiston Castle, Pembrokeshire, is an archetypal motte-and-Bailey Castle, and one of the best preserved in Wales. The 7 metre high motte or mound is crowned by the ruins of a circular stone keep and surrounded by a deep ditch. The surrounding Bailey may even originally have been an Iron Age defended settlement re-used in the medieval period. The Castle was probably established by an early Flemish settler, Wizo, during the twelfth century. In 1220 it was captured and destroyed by Llywelyn the Great, Prince of Gwynedd, during one of his campaigns in south Wales. (Text from the forthcoming 'Historic Wales from the Air, RCAHMW, 2012).

1847 The State of Education in Wales

Parish of Wiston

This parish lies a few miles to the North east of Haverfordwest. It is entirely agricultural. Wages are 3s 6d with food or 7s without. The inhabitants are generally hard-working and sober; but there is much low cunning, lying and (above all) unchastity among them. Public opinion hardly condemns unchastity at all. There are six farmers in the parish paying more than £100 in rent; but there is no difference in ideas and intelligence between them and the rest of their class. The children get no better, though a somewhat longer , education than those of mere labourers. The labourers can generally read, but not write. The great desiderata in the parish were said to be a resident Clergyman (there is no glebe house) and a better schoolmaster. There was , however great difficulty in knowing how to dispose of the old master without throwing him at once upon the parish. The landed proprietors are non resident. The Children in the parish are mostly going to some day school. The quality, rather the quantity of education was said to be in fault

Village School

I visited this school on the 8th of January.

I arrived at 3.20pm but found the scholars already dismissed – the days were so short. The room is little better than a mud hovel – dark, and meanly furnished with tattered leaves of books lying about.

The principal proprietors subscribe £13 per annum; and for this sum the master must educate the children of their tenantry without further payment. He is to have probably no more than 22 of such free scholars, but he takes 9 or 10 additional ones in order to accommodate very poor parents. Besides these he takes 21 pay scholars. Of the last he keeps a list but none of the others. I could obtain not the slightest account of their ages or period of attendance from him. The master appeared to be a thoroughly stupid and ignorant man, saying and unsaying all that was asked of him in such a manner that nothing could be gathered with certainty,-e.g. “he knew the length of the room to be

Wiz or Wizo the Fleming c1114 founded the Pembrokeshire Family .Wizo seems to have chosen an existing Iron Age enclosed settlement or rath as the basis for his Castle. A large conical earthen motte was thrown up across the bank of the earlier settlement, and a gateway was created on the north-eastern side of the rath defences. The unusually large Bailey of Wizo's stronghold probably served to house the borough occupied by the first group of settlers. The prehistoric defences would have provided them with ready-made protection against the newly-dispossessed Welsh , . It would originally have been a timber and earth motte and Bailey Castle. By the 14c the Castle which by then had a stone keep was abandoned the Wogan family who had become lords of the manor. Their principal residence was at nearby Picton Castle, though a cadet branch of the family built a manor house just beyond the east side of the Wiston earthworks. This developed into a substantial Tudor mansion Wogan William 1603 married Owen Sibyl, daughter of Sir Hugh Owen of Orielton is mentioned in George Owen's list of the commission of the peace in 1603.

Wogan John 1636 the son of Sir William Wogan was sheriff in 1636 and sat for the county of Pembroke in the parliaments of 1614, 1625, and 1640 he had an elder son,

Wogan Thomas 1646 M.P. for Cardigan in 1646. This Thomas who succeeded to Wiston and the Wogan Irish estates, which were confiscated in 1662, but afterwards restored to his brother Roland, was one of those who signed the death warrant of King Charles I. At the Restoration he escaped to Utrecht, where he is heard of engaged in plots in 1666. Fenton gives the tradition how he afterwards returned to the county and lived on charity in the Church porch of Walwyn's Castle, where he was one morning found dead.

Wogan Thomas 1663 About the time of the Restoration, a belief seems to have existed that the advowson was owned by Thomas Wogan of Wiston, the Regicide, as a warrant was issued on 15 September., 1662, for a grant to the bishops of London and Winchester, Sir Robert Hyde and Dr. William Thomas of the rectory, tithes, &c., of Wiston, co. Pembroke, 'lately belonging to Thomas Wogan, attainted of high treason, in trust for the maintenance of a minister there, if requisite, or of ministers in and about London or elsewhere.' - State Papers. Presumably this grant was never proceeded with, as the same records state that in May 1663 a grant was made to Col. Robert Werden and Charles Parker, of the estate, manor, and rectory of Wiston, and barony of Dungledy, co. Pembroke, forfeited by the attainder of Thomas Wogan.

If Thomas Wogan did own the property it seems most probable that the latter grant took effect, and that the purchase by Werden and Parker was made either on behalf of the Wogan family or else that the Wogans acquired the interest of the grantees therein.

It seems however much more likely that Thomas Wogan did not own either the Wiston estate or the advowson of the Church, because although Thomas Wogan was evidently alive in 1664 - a proclamation having been issued on 27 July in that year State Papers for his apprehension, he, having with others escaped from the Tower of London - we find that his nephew Henry Wogan by his will d 7 Feb., 1662, and proved in London on 9 Feb., 1662, devised all his lands in Wiston, with all rents and tithes belonging to the rectory thereof, to his wife and his mother for their lives, with remainder to his uncle Rowland Wogan. - 1 Laud, fol. 30

1811 Penty-Park Fenton (Tours)

Since the death of the late possessor now seldom inhabited but by servants placed to air it, belonging to a branch of the ancient family of Assailant, and after many descents from William Philipps, second son of Sir Thomas Philipps of Picton Castle the first of the name to settle there , became the inheritance of Lady Milford and her sister Mrs Jane Philipps.

Penty Park, Clarbeston road Cadw

18th century core heavily remodelled in later 19th century. Two storeys plus attic, H-plan country house with raised cement dressings, slate hipped roofs, cornice and two red brick ridge stacks. Overall the upper windows have moulded architraves while those below have plain raised surrounds. Three window centre range, ground floor French windows with top-lights first floor small-paned sashes and eaves cement-faced, coped and shouldered, gabled dormers. Projecting wings have similar dormers and both have first floor tripartite plate-glass sashes. Left wing has windowless ground floor, right wing has large rendered canted bay with pierced parapet. The interior is largely later 19th century, though the structure and some fireplaces may be 18th century.

1811 Haythog Fenton (Tours)

Lamborough Camp RCAM

An earthwork placed on a tongue of land, the two sides of which are protected by the steep slopes to Church Hill brook and a small tributary which joins it here. From slope to slope runs a convex rampart 175 yards in length. The bank is at its best to the south west where it rises some 7ft and falls 20ft to a ditch, 10ft wide and now waterlogged. The summit width of the bank is 5ft. The mid rampart is 70ft wide The enclosed area comprises 1 ½ acres; it rises to the west. The point above the junction of the stream shows signs of scarping, and also below the rampart to the south, where the bank is not more than 4 high – visited 15th July 1915

Woodbarn Camp RCAM

A circular enclosure on a field of Woodbarn Farm known as “Rath” field. It has a diameter of 250ft. The enclosing rampart has an average rise of 4ft with a fall of 8 to 10 ft to a 4ft ditch. The enclosed area is level and under cultivation. – visited 30th July 1915.

Castle Park Camp RCAM

A circular enclosure on a field still called Castle Park about ½ mile north east of Merryborough (? Mary borough) farm house; hence the work is locally known as Merryborough Camp. The enclosed area has a diameter of 120 ft. The rampart which is formed of earth and stone, is about 3ft high, the ditch 3ft deep. To the east the bank has been cultivated down but its course can be traced. The entrance faces the west; its present width is 20ft. The work is on low ground and overlooked from the north – visited 30th July 1915

1911 Colby Fenton (tours)

Leaving Llewhaden, I take the road by Colby, once the residence of a branch of the Barlows of Slebech, whose daughter and sole heiress married Sir William Hamilton, by which match he became possessed of a large and valuable property in this county, and by will settled the same on his nephew the Right Honourable Charles Grenville. The ancient mansion had long since been taken down to make room for a farmhouse and its name alone is retained. This place before it came to the Barlows, had passed through several hands, since its first transfer in the reign of Henry the Sixth from Sir Richard Newton, Chief Justice of England, who being alienated in his affections towards his native country by his education and high office, changed his name of Cradock to Newton, and with his Welsh name got rid of his Welsh possessions.

In a wide Moor near this house several pieces of armour have at different times been dug up, in consequence, as tradition is, of a bloody skirmish that took place there between the King's forces and those of parliament in the time of the civil wars; though in the prints of the day, entering much into detail of what then passed in this country, a curious collection of which I have had the opportunity of inspecting, I never could find any mention made of it.

Colby Moor Battlefield RCAM

On Colby Moor in 1645 the Royalists under Major General Stradling were defeated by the Commonwealth troops under Major General Laugharne. The next field north of the farmhouse is said to be the burial place of the slain.

Fenton (Tour p 320) adds that “several pieces of armour have at different times been dug up” – visited 30th June 1915.

Colby Moor Battlefield, Wiston RCAHMW

On Colby Moor, in 1645, the Royalists, under Major-General Stradling, were defeated by the Commonwealth troops under Major-General Laugharne. The next field north of the farm-house is said to be the burial place of the slain. Fenton (Tour, p.320) adds that 'several pieces of armour have at different times been dug up. visited 30 June 1915.' Armour has been unearthed in the field in which the barrow is situated and this field has been identified as a war cemetery.

(ref: Phillips, 'Civil War in Wales' 1874, i, 309)

In July 1645 a battle was fought at Colby Moor, half-way between Wiston and LLawhaden, in which the Royalist losses were 150 killed and 700 prisoners. Many relics were found on the site in 1818. (Archaeological Cambrensis, 5th Series 15, 1898, 270-1)

A nearby mound is reputed to contain the dead from the battle, but has recently been scheduled as a Bronze Age barrow.

Lower and Upper Greystone RCAM

The first and second fields west of Colby Mill. An erect stone which formerly stood here was broken up many years ago.

Lower Greystone RCAM

The third field west of Brynawel house, about half a mile south-east of Clarbeston road Station. The stone which gave a name to the field was broken up some years ago. visited 15th July 1915

Lower and Upper Hoarstone RCAM

occupies the site of a hospitium, but no reference has been found in records to such a building, nor are there any indications on the site, visited 27th July 1915

Conkland Hill, Wiston, RCAHMW

Royal Commission aerial reconnaissance during July 2013 revealed one of the most complex lowland defended enclosures in Pembrokeshire, sited on the rounded south-west facing spur of Conkland Hill, south-west of Wiston village. Despite many years of Archaeological aerial reconnaissance in the vicinity of Wiston, and the southern part of the field having been crossed in 2006 by the LNG pipeline, this is the first recorded archaeology on the Hill.

The main enclosure is of concentric-antenna type, measuring 250m x 208m diameter overall, with bivallate outer defences enclosing 4.09 hectares. The outer enclosure ditches comprise, on the east side, a sweeping bivallate arc curving around to the south-east where they form a pronounced in-turned entrance gap. The outer defences can be traced on the west side but they incorporate an earlier ditched or palisaded enclosure of which a bivallate arc 130m long survives (see below). Off-centre within the main enclosure is a smaller inner univallate enclosure approx. 50m diameter (enclosing 0.2 hectares) with a curving north-west antenna entrance; its junction with the outer enclosure is confused by a series of ditches. A D-shaped annex is appended to this inner enclosure.

At the north-west point where the antenna entrance should exit the outer enclosure the plan is confused by a second bivallate arc of segmented ditches which sweep in to cut across, or underlie, the north-west part of the concentric enclosure. Although appearing as an arc from a larger, intersecting enclosure they cannot be clearly traced any further west. Therefore it appears this may be a complex annex arrangement of the main enclosure. On the south side, the main concentric enclosure is interrupted by further arcs of additional enclosures. Some 80m west of the main enclosures can be seen crop-marks of two straight ditches with at least one gap, of different character to the enclosures.

Taken together this enclosure complex is not straightforward and apparently represents more than a single phase of enclosure, settlement and reoccupation of the same Hill. Further work is required to clarify the exact plan of the monuments.-- Updated June 2014

Manor Farm, Wiston RCAHMW

Manor House, Wiston RCAHMW

The Manor House is sited immediately East of Wiston Castle. A view by the Buck brothers c. 1740 (reproduced in Cadw's guide to Wiston Castle) shows the predecessor of the Manor House approached by a gatehouse. The gatehouse and three-storey domestic range beyond it stand more or less on the site of the present Home Farm . Beyond (perhaps marked by the smoke from the chimneys hidden by trees) is the present manor house. The old Manor House, the seat of the Wogan family, seems to have been abandoned after acquisition by the Cawdor estate. The shell of the old Manor House seems to have survived until the early C19th but the entry for Wiston in Lewis's Topographical Dictionary (1830s) explains that a farmer lived in part of the house, presumably the present Manor House.

The present Manor House was new-built in the first half of the early eighteenth-century. The house is of central entry type with bays with the stairs and services sited in a rear lean-to. Some surviving timber detail is broadly contemporary with the house including a splendid 'buffet' cupboard, doors with fielded panels, and the stair which has an ogee-stopped newel post. The splendid roof, recently revealed, dates the construction of the house to 1732.

The roof is complete and splendid example of vernacular carpentry. The roof-trusses are all of the same type: notch-lapped collar-beam trusses with chamfers. The trusses are boldly numbered I - XII but have not been erected in sequence. One of the trusses over the 'annexe' has the inscription 1732 on the collar which must date the house. The house was therefore newly-built at the time of Buck brothers sketch.

Duckspool Farm Mound

The site is identified as a possible Roman quarry pit/mound associated with the Roman road in the vicinity.

An apparent subcircular/circular mound, in the region of 5.0-7.5m in diameter, set immediately South of a probable drainage channel, suggesting an originally damp setting, can be identified as a possible burnt mound: cannot be associated with the route of Via Julia west of Carmarthen the line of which passes rather to the South RCAHMW

Wolfscastle.

Originally an Iron-age fortified settlement. Fenton (1808) is reputed to have found Roman Tesserae near here but in about 1080 was the site of a Norman Motte.

Topographical Dictionary of Wales 1839 Lewis Yerbeston

Yerbeston, a parish, in the union and hundred of Narberth, county of Pembroke, South Wales, 4 miles (S. W.) from Narberth; containing 148 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the turnpike-road from Pembroke to Narberth, and comprises a small extent of land, all enclosed and cultivated. Culm is found in some parts of it, but it is worked only for home consumption and the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a discharged rectory, rated in the King's Books at £5. 3. 9., endowed with £400 private benefaction and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Baron de Rutzen : the tithes have been commuted for a rent-charge of £70, and the glebe comprises 50 acres. The Church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There is a day and Sunday school in connexion with the Established Church.

Education in Wales (The Blue Book) 1847 Parish of Yerbeston

Village school

On the 9th day of December 1846. I visited this school which is being held in a dwelling house near the Church rented and paid for by the curate the Rev John Jones The children who attend from the adjoining parishes pay 2d a week. The Rev Mr Knox, the Rector gives £8 a year to the master, who, for this sum teaches the poor children of Yerbeston Parish without any payment from them. The walls, roof and floor of the house are in bad repair. In summer the school is held in the adjoining house, but that is in worse repair , since the late storm, than the house in which the school is held at present. There is not a better house to be had in the neighbourhood for the purpose. The Curate deplored the situation and said he was anxious to get a good schoolroom.

The furniture consisted of a bed for the master, two small tables four benches an old box and a few stools.

The master is a Pembrokeshire Englishman and appears to do his best to instruct his pupils, but complained very much of their irregular attendance. The school is utterly destitute of maps and apparatus. The greatest part of the scholars are children of labourers and understand only English. They read tolerably well and a few with ease. The answered questions put to them on what they had read.

The Rev John Jones the Curate of Yerbeston informed me that the labourers wages in this parish are 8d a day with food 1s to 1s 2d without. Masons 1s 8d with and 2s 6d without; farm servants £4 to £ 8 a year female servants £2 to £4.

There is gratuitous education for the poor of this parish, but many parents are too poor to get clothing for their children to send them to school. They learn the Church Catechism and attend the Church on Sundays. The people generally are very sober, steady and industrious. The best class of farmers can Read and write, but the smaller farmers are very ignorant.

The Parish Church dedicated to St Lawrence Yerbeston
